He becomes enraged with everyone even at the slightest transgression; he that would give me shelter should not anger me." As no one took notice of him (read with B. on nadriyate), I invited him. Sometimes he would eat food sufficient for many thousand persons, sometimes very little, and [sometimes] he would not return home; he would laugh and weep without any visible reason; no one at that time was equal to him in years; [one day] he burnt all the beds and coverlets and all the well-adorned damsels, and then went out; then he asked for rice-milk (pāyasa); having previously caused every kind of food and drink to be kept ready, I caused hot rice-milk to be brought; having eaten some, he ordered me to smear my limbs with the remnant, which I did; then he smeared Rukmini, and causing her to be yoked to a chariot, he, ascending that chariot, set out of my house striking her with the hook, and proceeded along the high road; the Daçarhas became angry; as Rukmini tottered, he struck her [with the whip]; then he leapt down from the chariot and fled towards the south on foot, followed by us Then he became gratified because I had subdued my anger, and said: "As long as gods and men will continue to entertain a liking for food, so long will everyone among them cherish the same liking for thee; so long as there will be righteous [men] (punyāḥ) in the worlds, so long will thy fame last; agreeable thou shalt be to all persons; whatever articles of thine have been broken or burnt or destroyed, thou shalt see restored or even better; thou wilt have no fear of death through such parts of thy body as have been smeared [with the rice-milk]; thou ought to have smeared also the soles of thy feet." I saw my body endued with great beauty and splendour. He also blessed Rukmini, saying: "Thou shalt be the foremost of women in fame, etc., free from decrepitude or diseases or loss of complexion, possessed of a fragrant odour, the foremost of Krehna's 60.000 wives, and [after death] thou shalt dwell in the same world as Krshna." Having recommended me to be always thus disposed towards the brahmans, he disappeared. I and Rukmini took the vow of always satisfying the brahmans. Having entered our house, I saw that everything which D had broken or burnt had become renewed. From that day forth I have always worshipped the brahmans: XIII, 160, 7416, 7449. - § 773 (Anuçasanik.): XIII, 161, 7458 (°ah prasadat).- § 773d (Civa): XIII. 161, 7494 (is a form of Civa).- § 789 (Putradarcanap.): XV, 30, 820 (repetition from § 131). — § 793 (Mausalap.): XVI, 4, †123 (had made Krshna invulnerable except on the soles of the feet, cf. § 7780). [Duryodhana-yajña(h)] ("the sacrifice of Duryodhana"). § 516 (Ghoshay., cf. Karnadigv.): Karna proposed to Duryodhana that he should celebrate a rajasuya sacrifice like Yudhishthira. But as the purchita told him that so long as Yudhishthira and Dhrtarashtra were living he could not undertake the rajasuya sacrifice, and advised him to cause the tributary kings to pay him tribute in gold, and with that gold to make a plough, and to plough the sacrificial compound with it, and then to perform a Vaishnava sacrifice that nobody had performed before save the ancient Vishnu (v. 15292, cf. v. 15329 foll.) which was equal to the rajasuya, this plan was agreed upon. Duryodhana appointed persons to their respective tasks, and desired all the artisans to construct the plough, etc. (III, 255). When Vidura had announced to Dhṛlarāshṭra that the preparations had been made, messengers were dispatched to invite the princes and the brahmans. Dunçasana ordered one messenger to invite the Pandavas, but Yudhishthira replied that they could not come before the completion of the thirteenth year. Bhima threatened; the other Pandavas said nothing unpleasant. Vidura was charged with the distribution of food to the guests. After the completion of the sacrifice, all the kings having been dismissed, Duryodhana, with his brothers and Karna and Cakuni, entered Hastinapura (III, 256). Duryodhana was praised by most of the citizens, and his friends compared him to Yayati, Nahusha, Mandhatr. and Bharata, who had gone to heaven after celebrating this sacrifice (v. 15329 foll., cf. v. 15292). Karna said that when Duryodhana had slain the Pandavas in battle and completed the rajasuya sacrifice he would once more honour him thus, and promised that until he had slain Arjuna he would not allow his feet to be washed, nor taste meat, and he would observe the Asura vow (i.e. not to drink intoxicating liquors, Nil.), and never refuse to give to whoever might solicit him.

Dvaitavana<sup>2</sup>, name of a luke (in the Dvaitavana forest). § 322 (Dvaitavanapr.): III, 24, 928 (°m nāma saraḥ), 930 (saraḥ), 931 (do.).—§ 324 (do.): III, 26, 965 (do.).—§ 449 (Ājagarap.): III, 177, 12359 (do., on Sarasvatī).—§ 512 (Ghoshayātrāp.): III, 237, 14784 (saraḥ); 239, 14844 (do.), 14848 (do.); 240, 14861 (do.), 14867 (do.), 14868 (do.), 14873 (do.).

Dvaitavanapraveça(h) ("proceeding to the Dvaitavana forest") (cf. Arjunabhigamanap.). § 322: The Pandavas, with Krshna and Dhaumya, on costly chariots yoked with excellent steeds, went into the forest, distributing nishkas of gold, etc., to brahmans versed in Cikshā (i.e., vedic pronunciation, PCR., or "grammar and the other vedangas," Nil.), akshara (= vedic orthography, PCR.; = veda, Nīl.), and mantras (= pranava, i.e. the syllable om, Nil.), and followed by twenty attendants with bows, etc., while Indrasena, with the princess's (i.e. Subhadra's, Nil.) clothes and ornaments and the nurses and maidservants, followed in a chariot. The citizens walked round Yudhishthira, and the brahmans and principal men of Kurujāngala of all castes saluted him and blamed the Dhartarashtras, etc. Arjuna told them that after their exile they would take away the good name of their enemies, and asked them to be eech the ascetics for their good. At last they returned to their respective abodes (III. 23). After a conference between Yudhishthira and Arjuna, they resolved upon dwelling for these twelve years at the sacred lake Dvaitavana (see BR.) in the forest of the same name (copious description), on the banks of Bhogavati (i.e. Sarasvati, Nil.), surrounded by many brahmans, and saluted by hosts of Caranas and Siddhas, who came to see Yudhishthira (III, 24),-§ 323: While they were dwelling there, Dhaumya performed their ishtis (i.e. darça-paurnamisa, etc., Nil.) and offerings to the Pilys, etc. Once the old rehi Markandeya came to them and smiled, recollecting Rama Daçarathi, whom he had seen on the top of the Rehyamuka, and comforted Yudhishthira by reminding him of the aforesaid Rama, Nabhaga, Bhagiratha, etc., and Alarka, the king of the Kāçis and the Karūshas (b), the seven rshis, who had followed the ordinance of the Creator and therefore blazed in the firmament; "so you will regain prosperity." Then he went away in a northerly direction (111, 25).—§ 324: The Draitavana forest becoming filled with brahmans (Bhrgus, Angirasas, Vāsishthas, Kāçyapas, Agastyas, Atroyas, etc.), and always resounding with Vedic recitations, mingling with the twangs of the bows of the Pandaras, a beautiful union of brahman and kehatriya customs was produced. Therefore one evening the rshi Baka Dālbhya represented to Yudhishthira that the kshatriya should always consult with a brahman, as did the Asura king Bali, the son of Virocana, who went to no other tirtha than the brahmans, and then had all his wishes gratified, but who met with destruction when he began to act unjustly towards them. Then all those brahmans, Draipāyana, Nārada, Jāmadagnya, etc. (enumeration) (a), praised Yudhishihira (III, 26).

Dyutaparvan ("the section relating to the gambling," the 28th of the minor parvans of the Mhbhr.). § 10 (Parvas.): I, 2, 319. - § 293: When Vydes with his disciples came to take leave, Yudhishthira asked him about the celestial, atmospherical, and terrestrial portents which, according to the statement of Narada, had happened at the rajasuya. Vyasa said that in thirteen years they would be fulfilled by the destruction of all the kehatriyas, and that Yudhishthira would that very night see Civa gazing incessantly towards the direction presided over by the king of the Pitre (i.e. the south). Then Vyasa with his disciples proceeded towards Kailasa. Yudhishthira resolved to die in order that he might not be the cause of the destruction of the kshatriyas, but called back from his intention by Phalguna (i.e. Arjuna), he took upon him the vow not to speak a harsh word to his brothers or to any of the kings. Then, having gratified the Pitrs and gods, he entered his own palace, accompanied by his ministers (II, 46).- § 294: Duryodhana, accompanied by Cakuni, by and by beheld all the sabhā; he mistook a piece of crystal for water and drew off his clothes, mistook a lake for land and fell in, etc., and was laughed at by Bhima, Arjuna, the twins, and the menials of the palace. Filled with wrath and jealousy he became pale, and returned to Hastinapura, together with Cakuni (II, 47). Cakuni told him to ask Yudhishthira, who was very fond of gambling and did not know how to play, to play at dice; then he (Cakuni), who was skilled in dice, would win his kingdom and prosperity for Duryodhana (II, 48). Cakuni told Dhrtarashtra that Duryodhana was pale and depressed; Dhrtarashtra asked Duryodhana the cause; Duryodhana told him that Yudhishthira supported 88,000 snātakas, giving to each of them thirty slave-girls; that 10,000 other brahmans daily ate at his palace the best food off golden plates; that the king of Kāmboja sent to him innumerable skins, etc.; that the Ocean brought the Varuna nectar to him in a vessel of copper, as the celestial wives (amarastriyah) to Indra; that Vasudeva, having brought an excellent conch, bathed him with sea-water brought in 1,000 jars of gold, etc., from the eastern, southern, and western oceans: that the conches, which were blown when 100,000 brahmans were fed, could be heard there almost incessantly. etc. Duryodhana proposed to Dhrtarashtra to invite Yudhishthira to a game at dice with Cakuni, and prevented him from consulting Vidura till he had had a sabhā built. Then he ordered Vidura, who dissuaded him in vain, to invite Yudhishthira. Vidura in great sorrow went to Bhishma (II. 49).—At the request of Janamejaya, Vaicampayana related that Dhrtarashtra, having ascertained the opinion of Vidura (b), sought to bring Duryodhana back from his purpose to play at dice; but Duryodhana would not give way, relating that the Nipas, Citrakas, the Kaukuras, the Karaskaras, and the Lohajanghas were like bondsmen in the house of Yudhishthira, and that Bhima, Arjuna, and Draupadi had laughed at his mistake regarding the crystal, etc. (II, 50).- § 295: Duryodhana enumerated to Dhrtarashtra the articles brought as tribute from various peoples to Yudhishthira. Yajhasen? (i.e. Krahpā) daily (during the rajastya) took care that everybody, including the deformed and the dwarfs, had eaten before she herself took her meal. Only two peoples did not pay tribute to Yudhishthira, the Pañcalas, in consequence of their relationship by marriage, and the Andhaka - Vrehnie, in consequence of their friendship (II, 52).- § 296: Duryodhana continued to enumerate kings, etc., who waited upon Yudhishthira at the rajasaya. The Ocean brought that Vāruņa conch (çaikyam, "in a sling," PCR., i.e. in a strap, cf. BR.), which Vicvakarman had constructed with 1,000 nishkas, and which Prajapati had in a former kalps presented to Indra; with that conch Krishna anointed (abhishiktah) Yudhishthira. When the conches were blown, those among the kings who were weak fell down, and Dhrshtadyumna, Satyaki, the Pandavas, and Keçava laughed; then Bibhatsu ( - Arjuna) gave to the principal brahmans 500 bullocks with horns plated with gold, and Yudhishthira obtained, like Haricoandra, such prosperity that he surpassed Rantidova, Nabhaga, Yauvanaçva, Manu, Prthu Vainya, Bhagtratha, Yayati, and Nahueha (II, 53) .- § 297: Continuation of the conversation between Dhrtarashtra and Duryedhana (II, 54, 55). - $ 298: As Cakuni recommended the match of dice and praised his own dexterity in gambling, and Duryodhana spoke reprovingly of Vidura on account of his fondness for the Pandavas, etc., Dhriarashira reluctantly caused the sabha (called Toranasphātikā) to be built, with 1,000 columns adorned with gold and lapis lazuli, a kroca in length and breadth, and then ordered Vidura to bring Yudhishthira and his brothers (II, 56, 57). Vidura arrived at the palace of Yudhishthira and invited him. Yudhishthira, having learned that he should have to play with Cakuni, Vivimçati, Citrasena, Salyavrata, Purumitra, and Jaya, "the most desperate and terrible gamblers, always depending upon deceit," was unwilling to come; but as he had made the yow never to refuse when challenged, he set out for Hastinapura the next day with his relatives, Draupadi, brahmans, etc., riding on the chariot taken charge of (so BR.) by Bahlika. and when he had arrived he saluted Bhishma, Drong, Karna, Krpa, Acvatthaman, Somadatta, Duryodhana, Calya, Saubala, Duhçasana, Jayadratha, etc., and Gandhari and Dhrtarashtra (II, 58). Cakuni exhorted Yudhishthira to gamble. Yudhishthira quoted Asita Devala (b), but he was obliged to assent; Duryodhana said that he himself would supply jewels, etc., and that it was for him that Cakuni would play (II, 59). The play began, the stake being a wreath of pearls, which Cakuni won (11, 60). Cukuni then won from Yudhishthira his treasury, slave - girls, serving - men, elephants, chariots. the Gandharva horses which Citrasena had given to Ariuna. his warriors, and nidhis (II, 61). Vidura, addressing Dhrtarashtra, quoted the words of Kavya, and reminded him that among the Bhojas they had abandoned an unworthy (asamanjasam) son; the Andhakas, Yadavas, and Bhojas had abandoned Kamsa, and when he had been slain by Krehna the whole tribe became glad for a hundred years; . "[likewise] let Arjuna slay this Suyodhana at thy command": he quoted what Kavya said to the Asuras in order to induce them to abandon Jambha, and related how a king from greediness after gold killed some gold-vomiting fowls that dwelt in his house, and so destroyed both his present and future wealth (II, 62). Vidura warned against the gambling, and suggested to Dhrtardshtra rather to win the Pandavas than their wealth, and to let Cakuni, the hill-king (Pārvatīyah), return whence he came (II, 63). Duryodhana blamed Vidura for his partiality towards the Pandavas, and said that he would only follow the advice of his own intellect.

Vidura complained of the ingratitude of kings and their fondness of flattery (II. 64). Yudhishthira lost his wealth, kine, horses, goats, and sheep, "from Paradea to the eastern bank of the Sindhu," his city, country, lands, and the wealth of all dwelling therein, except that of the brahmans, and all those persons themselves except the brahmans, the ear-rings and nishkas and other ornaments of the princes who were present, then Nakula, Sahadeva, Arjuna, Bhima, himself, and Draupadi; now Bhishma, Drona, Krpa, Vidura, etc., all gave way to grief, but Dhrtarashtra, Karna, Duhçasana, otc., were glad (II, 65).-§ 299: Duryodhana ordered Kshattr (i.e. Vidura) to bring hither Draupadi to sweep the chambers and stay with the servant maids; Vidura declared that having lost himself, Yudhishthira could not lawfully stake Draupadi, and said: "A goat had once swallowed a knife, and when it was pierced by it the hunter placed the head of the animal on the ground, and when drawing the knife out he tore its throat frightfully; therefore do not swallow the wealth of the Pindavas" (II, 66). Then Duryodhana ordered the pratikāmin (a sūta) to bring Draupadī; she ordered him to ask Yudhishthira whether he had lost himself or her first; as Yudhishthira said nothing, Duryodhana ordered that Draupadi should come and put her question in the assembly; she sent the sata back to the assembly saying that she would do what aged and virtuous persons would tell her; all sat without uttering a word; but Yudhishthira sent a trusted messenger to Draupadi, directing that, although in consequence of her season having come she was attired in one piece of cloth only. she should come before her father-in-law weeping bitterly. Duryodhana again ordered the pratikamin to bring her, and as he seemed irresolute, he asked Duhçasana to do so. As she would flee to the ladies' household, Duhçasana dragged her in by her hair, while she was praying to Krehna and Jishnu (i.e. Arjuna), who were Nardyana and Nara, and blaming Drona, Bhīshma, Vidura, etc., for looking silently on this crime. As she was casting a glance upon her enraged lords, Duhçasana, dragging her still more forcibly, addressed her, "Slave! slave!" and laughed aloud, applauded by Karna, Cakuni, and Duryodhana, while all the others were filled with sorrow. Bhishma declared himself to be unable to decide the question she had put. As she then asked the others present to decide it, Duhçāsana spoke many harsh words, and Bhima, looking at Yudhishthira, gave way to wrath (II. 67). Bhīma blamed Yudhishthira, and ordered Sahadeva to bring fire, as he wanted to burn the hands of Yudhishthira, but Arjuna appeared him. Vikarna repeatedly appealed to those present to decide the question, and as they did not say one word, he declared that as Yudhishthira must be regarded as of no authority, because he had shown himself addicted to the vice of gambling, etc., he regarded Draupadi as not won. All applauded him, except Karna, who maintained that she had been justly won, and as, contrary to the ordinance of the gods that a woman should have only one husband, she had five husbands, there was no impropriety in dragging her to the assembly, and even to uncover her. Karna then asked Duncasana to take off the robes of the Pandavas and the attire of Draupadi. The Pandavas took off their upper garments, and Duhçasana began to drag off the attire of Draupadi. But as she thought of and cried to Hari (i.e. Krshna), Dharma continually covered her anew with excellent clothes. Bhima swore that he would drink the blood of Duhçasana. All blamed Duhçasana and Dhrtarashtra. Vidura exhorted the assembly to answer the question put by Praupadi, and related the dialogue of Prahlada (q.v.) and Angirasa (i.e. Sudhanvan) (§ 300).- § 300 : v. Prahlada. - § 301 : The kings answered not a word, and Karna told Duhcusana to take away the slave - woman Krahna to the inner apartments (II, 68). Dragged by Duhcasana, Draupadi saluted the assembly, complained of being exposed to the gaze of the crowd, and again asked them to answer her question. Bhishma again declared himself unable to decide it, but thought Yudhishthira ought to decide it (II, 69). Duryodhana said to Draupadi: "Let thy husbands decide the question, and, by making Yudhishthira the just a liar, free thee from slavery." Bhīma said that only his obedience to Yudhishthira and the admonitions of Arjuna retained him from killing the wretched sons of Dhrtarashtra. Bhishma, Drona, and Vidura asked him to forbear (II, 70). Karna exhorted Draupadi to choose a new husband among the sons of Dhrtarashtra, and Duryodhana, after having exhorted Yudhishthira to decide the question. uncovered his left thigh and showed it to Draupadi. Bhishma swore that he would break this thigh of his. Vidura warned them, and was of opinion that Yudhishthira had no right to stake her. Duryodhana said that if Bhima, Arjuna, and the twins declared that Yudhishthira was not their master, then Draupadi should be free. Arjuna said that he was certainly their master before the play, "but having lost himself, let all the Kauravas judge whose master he could be after that." Just then a jackal began to cry near the agnihotra of Dhrtarashfra, and other terrible omens were heard. On that account Gandhari and Vidura remonstrated with Dhrtarashtra, who blamed Duryodhana and granted a boon to Krshnā. She chose that Yudhishthira should become free from slavery. As she was granted a second boon, she asked that Bhima and his brothers with their chariots and bows should regain their liberty. She refused to ask a third boon (II, 71). Karna praised Draupadi for having saved her husbands. Bhima threatened to slay all his foes instantly, but was retained by Arjuna and Yudhishthira (II, 72). Dhrtarashtra sent Yudhishthira with his brothers and Krehna upon their chariots to Indraprastha, having asked him not to remember the harshness of Duryodhana (II, 73).

Duryodhana rose from the lake and challenged the Pandavas (γ); Yudhishthira taunted him with his unfair conduct in slaying Abhimanyu (8) (IX, 32). Krshna reproved Yudhishthira for his rashness in staking everything on the result of such a single combat with Duryodhana (e); Bhimasena assured Krehna that Duryodhana would be no match for him in an encounter with the mace (); Krshna applauded Bhima, and exhorted him to slay Duryodhana ( $\eta$ ); Sātyaki, etc. ( $\theta$ ), applauded Bhima; Bhima's boastful address (1) to Yudhishthira and Duryodhana; Duryodhana's dignified reply, applauded by the Pandavas and Srnjayas; the elephants began to grunt and the steeds to neigh; the weapons of the Pandavas blazed forth of their own accord (IX, 33).- § 614: When the battle between Bhima and Duryodhana was about to commence. Bala-Rama (b), having heard that that battle between his two disciples was about to begin, came and was worshipped by the l'andavas, Krshna, etc. (a); he said that forty-two days had passed since he departed, having set out under the constellation Pushya and come back under the constellation Cravana; he was clad in blue robes and of fair complexion. Then that dreadful encounter took place (IX, 34).- § 615: Requested by Janamejaya (a), Vaicampayana related how Bala-Rama had determined upon and set out (under the constellation Mailra) on a pilgrimage to the tirthas on the Sarasvati  $(\beta)$ , having let the sacred fire be brought from  $Dv\bar{a}rak\bar{a}$ and the priests, and having given away rich donations to everyone who wished for them, accompanied by priests, friends, brahmans, chariots, elephants, steeds, and servants, visiting all the sacred places along her course. In the course of his wanderings he at last came to Kurukshetra. Requested by Janamejaya (7), Vaiçampāyana related the Baladevatīrthayātrā (q.v.) (IX, 35-54). Requested by Dhrtarashtra, Sanjaya related: Beholding Bala - Rama, Duryodhana rejoiced. According to the proposal of Bala-Rama, Yudhishthira with his brothers and Duryodhana proceeded westwards to Samantapañcaka on the southern side of the Sarasvati. D. and Ca. praised Duryodhana. Description of Bhima and Duryodhana (o). Duryodhana told Yudhishthira (who was standing among his brothers and Krehna and Rama) to behold the battle. protected by the Kaikeyas, etc. (n). That large assembly of kings sat down, as did also Bala-Rāma, who was worshipped by all around him. Bhima and Duryodhana stood inciting each other with violent speeches (IX, 55). The dispute between the two heroes  $(\rho)$ . At last Duryodhana said, "What is the use of bragging? fight with me," and was applauded by the Somakas, etc. The elephants grunted aloud and the steeds neighed repeatedly; the weapons of the Pandavas blazed forth of their own accord (IX, 56). Description of the combat; D., G., and men wondered; the Pandavas and the Somakas feared; adopting the manouvre called Kaucika, Duryodhana baffled Bhīma's mace; as Duryodhana once fell down to the earth, the Srnjayas cried aloud, so also did the Pandavas; Bhimasena then had his coat of mail fractured and was prostrated on the ground, but rose, steadying himself with great effort (IX, 57). Arjuna inquired of Krehna about the relative merits of the two combatants; Krshna said that their training had been equal, but Bhima was superior in strength; Duryodhana was superior in skill and had had more practice; by fighting fairly Bhīma would never succeed in winning, but by fighting unfairly he would surely be able to slay Duryodhana, just as the Asuras were vanquished by the gods, Virocana and Vrtra by Indra with the aid of deception; "Bhīma has vowed to break the thighs of Duryodhana with his mace; let him accomplish that vow of his": he censured Yudhishthira for his folly, and quoted a verse uttered by Uçanas; "Duryodhana has practised with the mace for full thirteen years." Arjuna struck his own left thigh before the eyes of Bhimasena, who understood the sign. As Duryodhana set his heart on the manœuvre called dvasthana and jumped upwards, Bhimasena hurled his mace at the thighs of Duryodhana and fractured them. Portents appeared; showers of blood and showers of dust were poured by Indra; a loud noise was made by Y., Ra., and Pc. (description of the portents); the Pañoalas and the Pandavas were filled with anxiety; D., G., Si., and Ca. went away (IX, 58). The Pandavas and Somakas rejoiced; Bhimasena rebuked Duryodhana, and touched his head with his left foot, which was censured by Yudhishthira, who grieved for Duryodhana (a) (IX, 59); Baladeva's wrath was excited upon seeing Duryodhana struck below the navel; he rushed on to slay Bhima, but was seized and pacified by Krshna (7). Baladera praised Duryodhana and cursed Bhimasena, and then ascended his chariot and proceeded towards Dvaraka. The Pañcalas, etc. (v), became dejected; Krshna and Yudhishthira, Bhīmasena, etc., and Duryodhana spoke about what had passed (IX. 60) (Krshna asking the Pandava warriors to forbear insulting Duryodhana; Duryodhana's angry reply to Krshna, charging him with every unfair act in course of the battle; Krehna reminded Duryodhana of his own evil acts, and referred to his miserable end as the inevitable consequence of those acts: Duryodhana's boast with reference to his end, which he pronounced to be most glorious) ( $\phi$ ). Celestial showers descended on Duryodhana's head; G., Aps., and Si. praised him. The Pandavas and Krshna became ashamed; but Krshna justified the use of unfair means for the slaughter of the Kuru warriors  $(\chi)$  (IX, 61). The Pandava warriors proceeded to the Kuru camp, which was entirely deserted  $(\psi)$ ; Krokna caused 987 Gādheyī—Gālava.

Arjuna to take down the Gandiva and his inexhaustible quivers. and then to dismount; then Krehna also dismounted; the celestial ape disappeared, and the chariot (burnt by Drona and Karna with the Brahma weapon), with its steeds, etc., was reduced to ashes. Krshna congratulated Yudhishthira on his victory, and Yudhishthira attributed that victory to Krshna's power  $(\omega)$ . In the encampment of the Kurus they found great wealth; at Krehna's suggestion the Pandavas and Satyaki resolved to pass the night at a spot outside the camp, on the banks of the Oghavati. They then dispatched Krehna to Hastinapura in order to pacify the wrath of Gandhari, and to comfort her and Dhrtardshtra. He set out with Daruka upon his chariot, yoked with Caibya and Sugrīva (1X, 62). Asked by Janamejaya, Vaicampayana said that the reason why Yudhishthira sent Krehna to Hastinapura was his fear that Gandhari, by means of her ascetic merit, should reduce the Pandavas to ashes, because Duryodhana had been slain unfairly (aa); "Vyāsa will be there." Krshna caused Daruka to equip his chariot, and quickly set out for Hastinapura. He arrived at Dhrtarashtra's palace, where Vyasa had arrived before him; he comforted Dhrtarāshtra ( $\beta\beta$ ) and Gāndhārī ( $\gamma\gamma$ ), who said that her heart had again become steady (δδ). Then Krshna came to know the evil that was meditated by Accatthaman, and suddenly took leave, requested by Dhrtarashtra and Gandhari to protect the Pandavas, and proceeded with Daruka. Vyasa comforted Dhrtarashtra. Krshna arrived at the camp and informed the Pandavas (IX, 63). Requested by Dhrtarashtra, Sanjaya narrated the lumentations of Duryodhana while lying on the field with his thighs broken ( $\epsilon\epsilon$ ); he thought himself happy, and asked Sanjaya to bring his message to his parents and to Acvatthaman, etc. (55) ("you should never place any confidence in the Pandavas"), and took leave of the messagebearers (ee); he was confident that Carvaka, the mendicant devotee, would avenge his death. Thousands of men, with eyes full of tears, fled away; the earth trembled, etc. The messengers went and informed Accatthaman and then went away (IX, 64). Açvatthāman, etc. (ζζ), came to Duryodhana, who lay surrounded by carnivorous animals, etc. Açvatthāman's lament and Duryodhana's reply (ηη); Açvatthāman vowed to slay all the Pancalas; Duryodhana let Krpa install Acvathaman as the Kuru generalissimo; then they took leave of Duryodhana and left him alone (IX, 65).

[Gālavacarita(m)] ("the history of Gālava"; cf. Gālavasya caritam). § 565 (Bhagavady.): In ancient times, in order to try Vicedmitra, who was then engaged in ascetic austerities. Dharma in the form of the Rshi Vasishtha, and feigning himself hungry, came to his hermitage. Viçvamitra cooked caru, but could not approach Dharma before his guest had dined with the other hormits. Dharma said, "I have already dined; wait here," and went away. Vicvamitra, bearing that food on his head and himself subsisting on air, waited a hundred years, while the ascetic Galava waited on him. Then Dharma accepted that food, which was still warm and fresh, and called Viçvamitra a viprarshi, whereby he became a brahman. Galava repeatedly asked Viçvamitra to take a gift from him as his preceptor, and at last Viçvāmitra, seeing his persistency, requested him to give 800 white steeds each with one black ear (V, 106). Galava got troubled and was gradually reduced to a skeleton. He thought of repairing to Vishnu (or Krshna), when his friend Garuda came, and said he had spoken to Vishnu in his behalf, and that he would bear him (V, 107). Garuda described the East: here Savity first rises, and the tapas of the Sadhyas is performed at eve; . . . the two eyes of Dharma; . . . here the daughters of Daksha in primeval times gave birth to their children, and here the sons of Kaçyapa first multiplied; here Çakra was first anointed as king of the gods; here is the tapas of Indra and the gods, all their religious ceromonies; here the Creator (bhagavān Lokabharanah) first sang the Vedas; here Savitri was first said by Savity to the reciters of the Vedas (brahmavadishu), and here the Yajurveda (yajūmshi) was given by Sūrya; here the Soma juice was first drunk by the gods, etc.; it was here that Varuna, repairing to Patala, obtained prosperity (crivam); here the birth, growth, and death of the ancient Vasishtha took place; here first grew the hundred branches (ertayah) of om; here the Munis called dhumapuh first imbibed the smoke of the havis; here the thousand-rayed Sun slays, rising, the wicked and ungrateful men and Asuras; here is the gate of the three worlds and the path to heaven and to felicity (V, 108). Garuda mentioned the remarkable subjects in the South (dakshind dic, so called because Vivasvat gave it away us u dakshina): Pitrpakshas trailokasya; Ūshmapah devāh; the Vicredevas with the Pitre, with whom they equally share the sacrifices in all the worlds; the second door of Dharma . . . ; the Devarshis, Pitrlokarshis, and Rajarshis, who dwell here in great happiness . . . ; it is the region whither all must repair; . . . there are Nairrtah to be seen by the sinful; the Gandharvas chanting on Mandara and in the abodes of the viprarshis: Raivata who, hearing the Samans, retired to the woods, leaving wife and friends and kingdom; Sāvarņi and Yavakrita setting a limit to Sarya (the southern tropical circle, PCR.); Ravana soliciting immortality from the gods; Vrtra incurring the enmity of Cakra; Vaitarant filled with the bodies of persons condemned to hell . . . ; reaching this region the sun drops sweet water (i.e. the beginning of the rainy season, Nil.), and thence, proceeding again to the Vasishtha direction (Vasishthim kashtham = the quarter of the seven Rshis, i.e. the North, Nil), once more drops dew (himam); there is Garuda obtaining for food an enormous elephant and tortoise; the great Rehi Cakradhanus' birth from Surya took place here (he was afterwards known as Kapila who burned Sagara's sons); the perfect (siddhah) brahmans, named Civah, who fully had mastered the Vedas, here obtained liberation (moksha); here is Bhogavati, ruled by Vasuki, Takshaka, and Airavata. Those that have to journey hither encounter here a thick gloom, so that it cannot be penetrated by either the Sun or by Agni; "even thou shalt have to pass this road" (V, 109). Garuda mentioned the remarkable subjects and occurrences of the West : Varuna's origin; his instalment by Kacyapa; the Moon, quaffing all the six juices of Varuna, becomes young again in the beginning of the bright fortnight; the Daityas being routed and bound fast by Vayu; the mountain Asta; Night and Sleep; Cakra beholding the goddess (devim) Diti asleep, and cutting off her feetus, whence sprang the Maruts; the roots of Himavat stretching towards the eternal Mandara (sunk in the Ocean. Nil.), the end of which is not to be reached by journeying for even 1,000 years; Surabhi milking on the shores of the lake with golden lotuses; in the midst of the Ocean the headless trunk of Svarbhanu; the chanting of the Vedas by Suvarnaciras (invisible, and whose hair is eternally yellow); Dhvajavatī, the daughter of the muni Hurimedhas, remaining in the air in consequence of Surya's injunction, 'stay'; . . . the sources of the rivers; here, in the abode of Varuna, are the waters of the three worlds; the abode of Ananta, and of Vishnu, and of Pavana (the friend of Agni), and of the Maharshi Kacyapa Marica (V, 110). The North (uttara) has its name from saving (uttarana) from sin; it is also called madhyama, i.e. between the East and the West. None can live there that is unamiable, etc. Garuda mentioned its remarkable subjects and places: Badari, the asylum of Narayana, Krshna, Jishņu, and Brahmán; Maheçvara with the effulgence of the Yuganta fire; Purusha dwelling with Prakrti, invisible to munis, D. with I., G., Y., and Si., except Nara and Nārāyaņa; there Vishņu appears alone, having 1,000 heads and 1,000 legs; there Candramas (the Moon) was installed in the sovereignty over the brahmans: Mahadeva receiving Ganga on his head; Devi practising austerities for obtaining Mahsçvara; Kāma; the wrath (of Çiva, PCR.); here took place Kubera's instalment, on the breast of Kailasa, in the sovereignty of Ra., Y., and G.; Caitraratha; here is the asylum of the Vaikhūnasas; Mandākinī; Mandara; Saugandhikavana, guarded by Nairrtas; the plantain forest (kadali-skandham), etc.; the Siddhas; the seven Rshis with Arundhatt; Svāti; Brahmán near Yajña . . . the munis named Phama (? so B.) (whose origin, etc., are not known) guarding Gāyantikādvāra (B. Gangāmahādvāram); the man who passes beyond them will certainly meet with destruction, except Narayana and Nara or Jishnu; here is Kailasa, the abode of Ailavila; the origin of the ton Apearases Vidyutprabhāḥ; Vishņupada, made by Vishņu, when he, in his covering the worlds with three steps, stepped on the northern region; here took place king Marutta's sucrifice at Ucirabija, by the side of the golden lake; here was Himavat's gold-mine, that exhibited itself to the viprarchi Jimuta, who gave away the whole wealth to the brahmans, and had it called after his name (Jaimata); here morning and evening the Lokapalae (d)cam palah) proclaim "what business of what person shall we do?": it is called uttara (North) because it is superior (ultara) to all (V, 111). At the request of Galava, Garuda carried him (description) to the East, and laughed at his foolish thoughts of casting away his life. At the mountain Rehabha they rested for some time (V, 112). On the peak of the Rehabha they met with a brahman lady, Candili, engaged in penances; she gave them cooked food; they fell asleep. As Garuda awoke, his wings had fallen off. It was because he had, out of pity, thought of carrying the lady to the place where Mahadeva, Vishnu, etc. (a), live together. She gave him his wings back, having warned him not to contemn women, and they set out, but failed to find the steeds. Vicvamitra met them, and said the time had already passed, but promised to wait for some time more (V, 113). Garuda explained the etymology of hiranya (gold) and dhana (wealth), and why gold is not easily obtainable (see the note of PCR. from Nil.); it is guarded by the Ajaikapad-Ahirbradhnah and by Dhanada (i.e. Kubera). They went to Garuda's friend, the Rajarshi Yayati Nahusha (of the Lunar race), in Pratishthana, and told him the matter, and that Galava, when he had paid off his debt, would devote himself to severe ascetic penances and give Yayati a portion of his wealth of asceticism: "as many hairs as there are in a horse's body, so many regions of bliss are attained by him that gives away a horse" (V, 114). Yayati, the performer of 1000 sucrifices, the liberal ruler of all the Kāçis, in view of the fact that they had come to him, passing over all the kings of the Solar race, not having the steeds, gave to Galava his daughter Madhavi, always solicited by gods, men, and Asuras. Garuda went away to his own abode, and Galava offered Madhavi to king Haryaçva of Ikshvāku's race at Ayodhyā, who was desirous of offspring (V. 115), on the condition that he gave as her dower the 800 steeds of the kind wanted. Haryaçva had but 200 stoods of this kind; he therefore got the maiden-who by a brahman had been granted the boon that after each delivery she would be a maiden again-in order to beget only one son upon her, for his 200 steeds. This son was Vasumanas. Then Gālava offered her to king Divodasa (V, 116), the Kāçi king, son of Bhimasona. The same arrangement was made as with Haryaçva. She bore him Pratardana (V, 117). Then Galava came to king Uçinara in the city of the Bhojas, with whom the same arrangement was made. To him she bore Cibi Then Galara took the maiden and went to see Garuda (V, 118). Garuda said that the remaining 200 steeds were unobtainable. For in days of yore Rolks sought at Kanyakubja Gādhi's daughter Satyavatī in marriage, and was requested by Gādhi to give 1000 steeds of this kind. Rcika obtained them at Acvatirtha, and gave them to the king. Performing the sacrifice Pundarika, the king gave them away to the brahmans. The three kings had each purchased 200 of them from the brahmans, but the remaining 400, while being transported over the Vitasta, were taken by the river (so B.). Viçramitra, instead of obtaining the 200 steeds wanting, begot Ashtaka upon Madhavi, and gave him the steeds; Ashfaka then went to a certain city (puram prayat tada Somapuraprabham) and Kaucika (i.e. Viçvamitra) to the woods. Galava dismissed Garuda, and returning the maiden to her father, he went into the woods (V, 119). Yayati went to a hermitage on the confinence of the Ganga and Yamuna, taking Madhavi, Puru, and Yadu with him, desirous of again disposing of his daughter in a svayamvara. There was assembled a vast concourse of N., Y., G., men, etc., and. numerous Rehis resembling Brahman himself. Madhavi selected the forest as her lord, practised tapas, and adopted a deer's mode of life (mrgacarini). King Yayati died after having lived for many thousands of years. The progeny of Puru and Yadu multiplied greatly. Yayati, resembling a maharshi, enjoyed the highest bliss in heaven for many thousands of yours. On one occasion, while scated among the Rajarshis and Maharshis, king Yayati mentally disregarded all the gods and Rshis and men. Indra at once read his heart; the dwellers of heaven did not longer know him, and he was soon divested of his splendour (V, 120). For continuation v. Yayati (§ 566).

Gandhamadana = Rávana (?): II, 410 (Rakshasadhipatih?). [Gandhamadana-praveça(h)] ("proceeding to the Gandhamadana"). § 419 (cf. Tirthayatrap.): Yudhishthira in vain proposed that Bhīma should return with Krehna, Sahadera, Dhaumya, the charioteers, cooks, etc., to Gangadvara, while Yudhishthira should proceed with Nakula and Lomaça. Bhīma promised to carry Krehna and the twins. Krshnā said that she would be able to go. They entrusted to the Pulinda king (v. 10866, Kulindanam) Subahu on the Himavat (inhabited by Kiratas, Tunganas, and Pulindas), the servants Indrasena, etc., the cooks and stewards, and Draupadi's accourrements, and began to proceed (III, 140).— § 420: Yudhishthira complained to Bhima that he had not seen Arjuna for five years. They now should, in company with brahmans of strict vows, enter Gandhamadana (b), etc. (III. 141).- § 421: Exhorted by Lomaça, when they were about to go to the mountain Mandara (b), they adored Akāçagangā (v. 10902, read with B. punya for puçya) (o), and then proceeded with the rehin .- § 422: Then they saw the bones of the Daitya Naraka (b) like to a white mountain .- § 422 bis: Varāhāvatāra (q.v.), III, 142.—§ 423: As they, with the brahmans, entered Gandhamadana (b) a terrible wind arose, followed by showers of rain, lightning, and torrents, during which they took shelter under trees, etc., Sahadeva carrying the sacred fire (agnihotrāni). When the tempest was over and the sun reappeared, they continued their journey (III, 143). When they had proceeded only a kroca, Draupadi sank down. Nakula ran forward and supported her, and the others hastily came, and Yudhishthira took her on his lap and lamented. Dhaumya and the other brahmans comforted and blessed him, and by reciting mantras capable of dispelling Rakshasas, and by performing ceremonies, while she was touched and funned by the Pandavas, they made her regain her senses. The twins pressed her feet with their hands. Bhima promised Yudhishthira to carry them all over the snowy mountains, "or Ghafotkaca will carry us all." With Yudhishthira's permission Bhīma thought of Ghatotkaca, who immediately came and was embraced by Bhima (III, 144). Ghatotkaca carried Krshna through the air, and hundreds of other Rakshasas carried the Pandavas and the brahmans, while Lonaga moved along the path of the Siddhas. So they proceeded through regions inhabited by Mlecchas, Vidyadharas, monkeys, Kinnaras, Kimpurushas, Gandharvas, etc., and the northern Kurus, towards Kailasa and Badari (c), where they were received by the numerous rshis, and where they dwelt, beholding Mainaka, Hiranyaçikkara, Bindusaras, and Bhagirathi, and offering oblations, etc. (III, 145).

[Gāndhārīputrotpatti(h)] ("birth of Gāndhārī's sons"). § 180 (Sambhavap.): One day Draipayana, gratified with Gāndhārī's hospitality, granted her the boon that she should have 100 sons (cf. § 174). She had borne the burden in her womb for two years, when she heard that Kuntī had brought forth a son; she then struck her womb violently, and there came out a hard mass of flesh like an iron ball. When she was about to throw it away, Vyūsa appeared and caused her to put the ball of flesh, sprinkled with cool water and divided into 101 parts (each of the size of a thumb), into 101 pots filled with clarified butter, which were placed in a concealed spot. After having said that she should open the covers of the pots after two years, Vyūsa retired to Himavat in order to devote himself to asceticism. Duryodhana was younger than Yudhishthira, being born on the same day as Bhīma. As soon as Duryodhana was born he began to cry like an ass. and ill-portending omens appeared. Vidura, etc., in vain told Dhrtarashtra to abandon him. Within a month the 100 sons of Dhytardshtra and one daughter were born. [Gangāvataraṇa(m)] ("descent of the Ganga"). § 389 (Sagara): Asked by Sagara to bring back the horse and deliver him from hell (Narakad), Amcumat went to the spot where the earth had been excavated, entered the sea by that very way, and beheld Kapila and the horse. As he bowed his head before Kapila, etc., Kapila granted him the horse, and that his fathers should be purified and go to heaven, when his son's son, by the favour of Civa, brought Tripathaga (i.e. Ganga) from heaven. When he had brought the horse back to the sacrificial yard and narrated all the events to Sagara, Sagara grieved no more, but praised Amcumat and finished the sacrificial rites. Sagara was greeted by all the gods and converted the sea into a son of himself (putratve kalpayam dea), and after a long reign placed his grandson on the throne and ascended to heaven. Angumat ruled the whole earth like Sagara, and died after he had placed his son Dilina on the throne. Dilina in vain tried to effect the descent of Ganga in order to raise his forefathers. He then anointed his son Bhagiratha as king, and practised austerities in the forest, and then ascended to heaven (III, 107). Bhagiratha made over his kingly duties to his minister (sacive), and (b) practised austerities on the Himavat during 1000 celestial years, living upon fruits, roots, and water. Then Ganga Haimavati appeared in a material form (murtimati), and promised to besprinkle the bodies of his forefathers and carry them to heaven, and as there existed none in the three worlds except Civa, who was able to sustain her fall, she caused Bhagiratha to go to Kailasa, where he, by his austerities, obtained the favour of Cira (III, 108), who, surrounded by his awful attendants (parishadaih), came to Himavat. There he caused Bhagiratha to pray to Ganga. Ganga immediately came down from the sky, in the presence of the gods, maharshis, Gandharvas, snakes, and Yakshas, and Civa received her on his forehead, whence she fell to the earth, divided into three streams. At her request Bhagiratha led her to the spot where the bodies of Sagara's sons lay, while Civa went to Kailasa with the celestials. Ganga filled the sea, and Bhagiratha adopted her as his daughter and offered libations of water to his forefathers (III. 109).

(Vitahavyop.): XIII, 30, 2006 (vamcah). Garuda, the son of Kacyapa and Vinata, the vehicle of Vishnu (Kṛshṇa), or the emblem of his flagstaff. § 11 (Anukram.): I, 2, 365.—§ 27 (Kacyapa): I, 16, 1092 (son of Kaçyapa and Vinata).—§ 32b (Kadrū): In the meantime G. came out bursting the egg and ascended the skies. The gods thought that it was Agni, but were undeceived): I, 23. 1239, 1245, 1248.—§ 33 (Āstīkap.): Then the gods and the rshis praised G. and prevailed upon him to diminish his own energy and splendour: I, 23, †1255.—§ 34 (do.): Bearing his brother Aruna on his back G. went from his father's home and arrived at his mother's side on the other shore of the ocean and placed Aruna in the east: I, 24, 1262.—§ 36b (Kadrū): G. carried the snakes on his back, but ascended too near to the Sun so that the snakes became scorched by the rays of the Sun: I, 25, 1283.—§ 40 (Astikap.): The serpents promised that if G. brought them the amrta he and his mother should be freed from bondage (I, 27). Having been directed by Vinatā to live upon the Nishādas (b) but not to injure the brahmans, and being taught by her how to know who is a brahman, he set out, and, having come to the Nishādas, he raised a great quantity of dust, and opened his mouth; there the Nishadas entered by thousands, being blinded by the dust, and were devoured (I, 28). A brahman who, with his wife of the Nishāda caste, entered the throat of G., and began to burn him, was recognized and relieved with his wife by G. (1, 29): I, 28, 1320, (1327); 29, (1343), 1344.—§ 41 (do.): As G.'s hunger was not appeared Kacyapa told him of the elephant Supratika (b) and the tortoise Vibhavasu: I, 29, (1348).—§ 42 (do.): Then Kacyapa blessed G.: I, 29, 1371.—§ 43 (do.): G. then seized the elephant and the tortoise and came to the tirtha Alamba (? Nil. and BR., "without reposing") (b). A banyan-tree invited him to sit on one of its huge branches, but the branch broke (I, 29). G. caught the branch with his beak, and perceiving Valakhilyas suspended therefrom with their head downwards he continued to fly with the branch, the elephant, and the tortoise, fearing to kill the Valakhilyas if he should throw away the branch. The Valakhilyas therefore gave him the name Garuda (etymology: gurum bhāram samāsādyoddīnah, v. 1390). On Gandhamādana he saw Kaçyapa engaged in ascetic devotions. Kacyapa propitiated the Valakhilyas (c) for him, then they abandoned the bough and went to Himavat to practise ascetic penances. According to the advice of Kacyapa G. flew away for a hundred thousand of yojanas to a mountain without human beings, there he threw down the bough and ate the tortoise and the elephant. Then he again rose on his wings: I, 29, 1375; 30, 1384, 1390, 1400, 1407, 1413.—§ 44 (do.): Omens foreboding fear began to appear among the gods. Brhaspati declared that it was owing to the fault of Indra and the ascetic penances of the Valakhilyas (cf. § 45) that G. now approached to take away the soma. Indra then caused the gods to surround and watch the amrta (I, 30).-§ 45 (Vālakhilya, pl.): I, 31, 1436, 1469, 1470 (by the penances of the Vālakhilyas G. had been born as the lord of winged creatures (patatrinam indrah, v. 1455)).- 46 (Astikap.): G. attacked the gods, whom he blinded with dust, and Bhaumana lay as dead on the field. Indra caused Vayu to dispel the dust. The Sadhyas and the Gandharvas fied eastwards, the Vasus and the Rudras towards the south, the Adityas towards the west, and the Acvins towards the north. G. then slew nine Yakshas, Açvakranda, etc. (a), who guarded the amrta. The amrta on all sides was surrounded with fire. G. then divided his mouth into 8100 mouths, and taking water from many rivers he extinguished the fire. Then he assumed a diminutive body (I, 32), and passed through the spokes of the revolving keen-edged wheel of steel placed before the soma. Then there were two great snakes, who would reduce to ashes everyone who might be seen by them. G. covered their eyes with dust, and unseen by them mangled them to pieces. He then flew away with the amrta, not drinking it himself. He met with Vishnu on his way and they agreed that G. should stay above Vishnu, sitting on the flagstaff of his chariot and be his vehicle, and be immortal and free from disease without drinking ampta. While G. was flying Indra hurled his thunderbolt at him. G. did not feel the slightest pain, but in honour of Dadhica and Indra and the thunderbolt G. dropped a feather, and from its beauty he gained the name Suparna (I, 33). Indra and G. made friendship with each other, and agreed that G. should not give the some to anyone for drink. Indra should bring it away after it had been put down by G., and G. should feed on the snakes. The snakes declared Vinata to be free; G. placed down the soma on some kuça grass, and while the snakes were performing their ablutions, their daily devotions, and other religious rites, Indra took up the amrta and returned to heaven. When the snakes licked the kuça grass their tongues were divided in twain, and the kuça grass, from the contact with the amrta, became sacred from this time (I, 34): I, 32, 1471 (pakshirāt), 1477, 1485, 1494; 33, 1509, 1513; 34 (1520), (1528), 1534, 1543. - § 99 (Amçavat.): I, 65, 2548 (among the Vainateyas). - § 120 bis (do.): I, 66, 2603 (Vainateyah, reckoned among the Adityas).—§ 129 (do.): I, 66, 2635 (°arunau, sons of Vinatā).—§ 191 (Arjuna): I, 123. 4830 (present at the birth of Arjuua).- § 244 (Rājyalābhap.): I, 207, 7575 (dvipaksha - G°prakhyair dvāraih). — § 289 (Arghaharanap.): II, 38, 1395 (patatām mukham).—[§ 277 (Jarasandhavadhap.): 11, 24, 945, 946 (Garutman, took his seat on the flagstaff of Krshna)].—§ 512 (Ghoshayātrāp.): III, 241, 14897 (rathair Gonificoanaif). - § 549 (Pandavapr.): IV, 2, 51 (patatām iva, sc. varah).—§ 561 (Yānasandhip.): V, 71, 2578 (Krshna identified with Arishtanemi, Garuda, Suparna).—§ 564 (Mātaliyop.): V, 101, 3600 (°ātmajūķ, enumeration of his descendants); 105, 3674, (3676), 3704, 3705 (G. who wished to devour the serpent Sumukha was humiliated by Vishnu, who then threw Sumukha upon the 301 Garuḍa—Gautama.

The Pañoalas, etc. (11), & Drona (VII, 166). Karna & Sahadeva, who was worsted by Karna, who touched him with his bow and scoffed at him (kk), but did not slay him, recollecting the words of Kunti; Sahadeva ascended the chariot of the Pañcala prince Janamejaya. Virata & Calya, who deprived him of his chariot and then slew Virāja's brother Catānīka; once more Virāja (ascending Catanika's chariot) & Calya, who made him insensible; Virata was carried away by his charioteer; the host fled away. Alambusha (with terrible-looking Piçacas of equine faces yoked to his chariot; description) & Arjuna (+ Krshna), who vanquished him; Alambusha fled away. Arjuna quickly proceeded towards Drona, slaughtering men, etc.; they all fled (VII, 167). Citrasena (Dhartarashtra) & Nakula's son Catantka, who vanquished him; Citrasena ascended Krtavarman's chariot: Vrshasena & Drupada, who swooned and was carried off by his charioteor: Vrshasena caused a great slaughter among the Pañcalas and the Somakas, and then proceeded to Yudhishthira. Duhçasana (Dhartarashtra) & Prativindhya, who was vanquished by him and rescued by his brothers, ascended the chariot of Sutasoma and continued to fight Duhcasana, to whose assistance many warriors rushed, and a fierce battle ensued (VII, 168). Nakula & Cakuni, who was carried away by his charioteer; Nakula proceeded towards Cikhandin (proceeding towards Drona) & Krpa; (Cikhandin was carried away by his charioteer); the Pañcalas and Somakas surrounded him, and Dhytarashtra's sons surrounded Drona. A battle commenced once more (description) (VII, 169). Dhrshtadyumna (+ the Pañcalas and Pandavas) & Drona; D., G., and Da. wished prosperity to Drona: Karna, etc. (λλ) (in order to rescue Drona) & Dhrshtadyumna: Dhrshtadyumna & Drumasena, whom he slew: the six chariot warriors & Dhṛshṭadyumna; Sātyaki (in order to rescue Dhrshtadyumna) & Karna; the sons of Dhrtarashtru+Karna+ Karna's son Vrshasena & Dhrshiadyumna + Satyaki : Gandiva was heard, and the sound of Arjuna's chariot. Karna counselled Duryodhana to encompass and slay Dhrehtadyumna and Satyaki; Duryodhana dispatched Çakuni with a large force (also Duhçasana, etc. (μμ)) against Arjuna, to slay Arjuna, etc. (vv); a great fight commenced. Cakauni, etc., & Satyaki; Drona & Dhrshtadyumna + the Pañcalas (VII, 170). Sātyaki was surrounded by many leaders of the Kuru army; Duryodhana & Yuyudhana, who forced him to fly away (having mounted the chariot of Krtavarman), and routed the foes with whom he was engaged. Arjuna & Cakuni (+ his son Ulūka), whom he deprived of his chariot; Cakuni ascended the chariot of Uluka; Arjuna slew the Kuru army. Krshna and Arjuna blew their conches. Dhrshtadyumna & Drona, whom Dhrshtadyumna checked and caused an immense carnage. Dhrshtadyumna, etc. (ff), blow their conches (VII, 171). Duryodhana in anger addressed Drona and Karna (ov), who furiously attacked and routed the Pandava army; Drona, etc.  $(\pi\pi)$ ; the Pandava host fled, throwing down their torches before the eyes of Bhimasona, etc.  $(\rho\rho)$ , pursued by Drona and Karna; Arjuna and Krshna rallied the retreating troops (oo); a wild battle ensued between the Kurus (especially Drona and Kurna) and the Pandavas (especially Yudhishthira) (description) (VII, 172). Karna & Dhrshtadyumna, who was deprived of his chariot by him, but then slew his steeds and ascended the chariot of Arjuna and desired to proceed, but was stopped by Yudhishthira. Karna routed the Pañcalas, who, with the Somakas, attacked Karna. Meanwhile Karna's charioteer had yoked other white steeds of the Sindhu breed to his chariot. The Pancala host (and the Synjayas) fled (description); others, only observed by Drong, fled away on all sides. Yudhishthira and Arjuna (and Krshna) conversed about Karna; Arjuna asked Krshna to proceed towards Karna. Kṛshṇa said that none except Arjuna and Ghatotkaca could encounter him; but Arjuna must not do it, as long as he had the lance given him by Indra; "but Ghatotkaca (who had celestial weapons, as also those used by Ra. and As.), would vanquish Karna." They prevailed upon Ghatotkaca to encounter Karna (77); "thou, O Ghatotkaca, Sātvaki, and Bhimasena are the foremost among all our warriors; Sātyaki will protect thy rear." Ghatotkaca & Karna (VII, 173). Duryodhana urged Duhçasana to protect Karna against Ghatotkaca. Meanwhile the Ra. Jatasura's son Alambusha said to Duryodhana that he wished to slay the Pandavas in order to avenge his father, whom they had slain, performing some Ru.-slaying incantations. Duryodhana urged him to slay Ghafotkaca. Alambusha & Ghafotkaca; both resorted to their power of illusion (vv); Ghatotkaca slew Alambusha and threw his head upon Duryodhana's chariot, promising that he should also see the slaughter of Karna and then his own. Ghatotkaca & Karna (VII, 174). Requested by Dhrtarashtra, Sanjaya described Ghatotkaca's person, armour, weapons, and chariot; then the encounter between Karna & Ghajotkaca, who employed Ra.-illusion, and even destroyed the celestial weapon of Karna; a Vayavya weapon was employed by Kurna to destroy clouds; Ghafotkaca was once seen on a chariot, created by illusion, yoked with a number of asses, looking like elephants, and having the faces of Picacas; Ghatotkaca employed an açani of Rudra's workmanship, furnished with eight wheels; there appeared many Ra., Pc., and Yātudhānas, etc. (VII, 175). Meanwhile, the Ra. Alüyudha, with many thousands of Ra., came to Duryodhana, and said that he wished to avenge his kinsmen Baka and Kirmira, and his friend Hidimba, and the marriage of Hidimba, by slaying all the sons of Kunti, especially Bhima, with Krshna, Ghatotkaca, etc. Duryodhana urged him to slay Bhima. Aluyudha's churiot, steeds, weapons, etc., were pretty much as those of Ghatotkaca's (description) (VII, 176). The Kurus with Duryodhana welcomed Alayudha, having been (with Drona, etc.  $(\phi\phi)$ ), very anxious about Karna, who was engaged with Ghatotkaca. Alayudha & Ghatotkaca (abandoning Karna); Karna & Bhimassna; Bhima (disregarding the advancing Karna) & Alayudha (abandoning Ghatotkaca) + all the other Ra. (who fled away); the Ra. attacked the elephants, the Pañedlas, and the Srňjayas. Krshna urged Arjuna to proceed in Bhīma's wake, and to let Dhṛshṭadyumna, etc.  $(\chi \chi)$ , proceed against Karna, Nakula, etc.  $(\psi \psi)$ , slay the other Ra.; Arjuna himself should resist Drona's division; then Krshna dispatched Ghatotkaca to protect Bhimasena (VII, 177). Ghatotkaoa (ubandoning Karna) & Alayudha (brother of Baka). Meanwhile, Yuyudhāna, etc. (ωω), & the Rā. of Alāyudha; Arjuna shot many kehatriyas, Karna many Pancalas headed by Dhrshtadyumna, Çikhandin, etc. Bhīma + Nakula, etc. (aaa) (having slain the Rū.) & Karņa; the Pāncālas & Drona; Alūyudha resorted to his power of illusion, and so did Ghatotkaca, who cut off the head of Alayudha and threw it down before Duryodhana, who, with all his troops, became full of anxiety, while the Pañcalas and Pandavas roured like lions (VII, 178). Karņa & the Pūūcālas, etc.  $(\beta\beta\beta)$ ; many of them entered the force of Yudhishthira. Ghatotkaca & Karna, who had his steeds and charioteer slain by Ghatotkaca. who then disappeared from view, and created a terrible illusion (description), which severely afflicted the Kuru host, which at last fled; Karna alone kept his ground, looked at by all the Saindhavas and Bühlikas; Karna's steeds were again slain by Ghatotkaca, and his celestial weapon was baffled by The Kauravas urged him to slav Ghatotkaca's illusion. Ghafotkaca with the dart presented to him by Indra, without minding Bhima, etc. (777). When Karna held the dart in his hands Ghatotkaca began to fly away in fear, all creatures in the skies uttered loud cries, etc.; Karna burled the dart, and Ghatotkaca was slain, and falling upon the Kaurava army with his gigantic body, he slew a full akshauhini, desirous of benefiting the Pandavas. The Kauravas uttered loud shouts of joy; Karna ascended the chariot of Duryodhana and entered the Kuru host (VII, 179). The Pandavas were filled with grief; only Krehne with transports of delight raised his warcry, embracing Arjuna, to whom he explained that he rejoiced because Karna's dart could not now kill Arjuna, having been employed against Ghatotkaca; he recited to Ariuna how he had gradually caused all the foes of the Pandavas to be slain (VII, 180), which he explained more explicitly (888) (VII, 181). Requested by Dhytarashtra why Karna had not hurled the fatal dart at Arjuna. Sanjaya assigned Krehna's policy as the reason (eee), though it had formed the subject of deliberation with Duryodhana, etc. ( [ [ ] ]), every night. Satyaki asked Krehna why Karna had not hurled his dart at Arjuna; Krehna said that Duhçusana, etc., had frequently discussed this subject, and Karna had approved of it; but Krshna always used to stupefy him: Krehna had neither sleep nor joy in his heart, as long as he could not frustrate that instrument for killing Arjuna (VII, 182). Concluding from Karna's not using the dart (see, KK), Dhriarashtra attributed the ill success of the Kurus to Destiny, their own folly, and the policy of Krshna, and asked Sanjaya about the battle  $(\eta\eta\eta)$ . Sanjaya related: All the Kauravas uttered loud shouts and began to slay the Pandava troops. Yudhishthira told Bhimasena to resist the Dhartarashtra host, himself sitting down with tearful face: Krshna comforted him, but Yudhishthira remembered the many services Ghafotkaca had rendered them (000); Drona and Aquatthaman were the real cause of Abhimanyu's slaughter, but it was Jayadratha who was slain; "Drona and harna are the root of our woes"; therefore Yudhishthira will slay Karna, Bhimasena being engaged with Drona's division. Yudhishthira quickly proceeded against Karna, followed by the Pañcalas, etc. (...). Vyāsa approached Yudhishthira and congratulated him upon Karna's having employed his dart against Ghatotkaca; "on the 5th day from hence the earth will be thine." Then he disappeared (VII, 183).

[Ghoshayātrāparvan] ("the expedition to the cattle station"), the 43rd of the minor parvans of Mhbhr. (cf. Ghoshayātrā). § 512: When the Pāndavas had arrived at the lake (of Dvaitavana, Nil.), and were dwelling in the woods visited by veda-knowing ascetics, there came to them a brahman, who afterwards went away to Dhrtarāshtra and told him how the Pāndavas had become emaciated and reduced by wind and sun. Dhrtarāshtra was much afflicted, considering that Yudhishthira, who had formerly used to sleep on beds of ranku skins and to be wakened by sūtas and māgadhas, now slept on the bare ground; he lamented the treatment he had permitted to be meted out to the Pāndavas, and feared leát they would avenge themselves; Arjuna, he thought, would not have left heaven, where he received the celestial weapons, if it were not for this purpose. This Cakuni told to Duryodhana, who was sitting with Karna, and Duryodhana was filled with grief (III, 236). Cakuni and Karna proposed to Duryodhana that they should go to Draitavana to exult over the Pandavas (III, 237). Duryodhana gladly approved the proposal, but feared that he might not obtain the permission of Dhytarashtra, who thought that the Pandavas had become more powerful than before in consequence of their ascetic austerities. He asked them, with Dunçasana, to find out some skilful pretext. The next morning Karna and Cakuni agreed with Duryodhana that they should go there under the pretext of supervising their cattle stations (III. 238). They then all saw Dhrtarashfra. A cowherd, named Samanga, who had been instructed beforehand, came to the king and spoke to him of the cattle. Karna and Cakuni asked him to give permission to Duryodhana to go thither. Dhṛtarāshṭra suggested to send some faithful men, fearing some collision with the Pandavas if they were to go thither themselves; for though Yudhishthira would not suffer his wrath to be awakened, Bhima and Draupadi were naturally passionate. Cakuni promised that they would not go to the spot where the Pandavas resided, and obtained the permission. Duryodhana then started with Karna, Duḥçāsana, Çakuni, etc., and ladies by the thousand, followed by the citizens and their wives, with 8,000 chariots, etc., and took up his quarters at the distance of a gavyūti from the lake of Dvaitavana (III, 239). Having caused the calves to be marked, etc., Duryodhana, etc., began to sport and go a-hunting, and came to the lake. Yudhishthira was then. together with Draupadi, celebrating the diurnal rajarshi sacrifice according to the ceremonial used in the forest. When the attendants of Duryodhana came to the banks of the lake to construct pleasure-houses, they were forbidden to enter by a number of Gandharvas, who told them that the king of the Gandharvas had come from the abode of Kubera, with his followers and several hosts of Apearases, etc., and when Duryodhana sent a number of his warriors, they also were prevailed upon by the Gandharvas to return (III, 240). A battle ensued between the soldiers of Duryodhana and the Gandharvas, headed by their king Citrasena; the soldiers of Duryodhana fled, except Karna, who killed hundreds of Gandharvas. Duryodhana, Çakuni, Duhçasana, and Vikarna returned to assist Karna, and the battle was renewed. Citrasena made use of illusion; it seemed as if every warrior of the Kuru army were surrounded by ten Gandharvas. The entire army of Duryodhana again fled, except Karna. The Gandharvas then destroyed the chariot of Karna, who, mounting the chariot of Vikarna, was forced to drive away (III. 241). Duryodhana refused to fly, but the Gandharvas destroyed his chariot and slew his chariotecr and horses; thereupon Citrasena took him prisoner, and Duhçasana, who was seated on his chariot, and Citrasena, Vivinçati, Vinda, and Anuvinda, and the royal ladies, were taken by other Gandharvas, [and Durvishaha, Durmukha, and Durjaya, v. 14924]. The flying soldiers and ministers of Duryodhana took refuge with Yudhishthira (III, 242). Yudhishthira. saying that the honour of the family was being destroyed by the Gandharvas' scizing Duryodhana, etc., in their presence, prevailed upon his brother to rescue Duryodhana, etc. (v. 14947: "the liberation of a foc from distress is equal to the bestowal of a boon, sovereignty, and the birth of a son, all the three put together"), if possible, by conciliation or lightly skirmishing, otherwise by all means, Yudhishthira being prohibited from partaking in the combat by his sacrifice. Ariung promised to rescue Duryodhana or kill the king of the Gandharias (111, 243). The four Pandaras, cased in mail and riding in chariots drawn by fleet horses, encountered the Gandharvas; as these would not set Duryodhana, etc., free, as requested by Arjuna, a fierce battle ensued (III, 244). The Gandharvas, in vain, attempted to break the chariots of the Pandaras; especially Arjuna, by means of his Agneya weapon, sent millions of them to the abode of Yama. The Gandharvas then rose up to the skies, taking the Dhartarashtras with them, and showering maces, darts, etc., upon Arjuna, who killed them with his weapons Sthulukarna (B. Sthunukarna), Indrajula, Saura, Agneya, and Saumya. At last Citrasena rushed at Arjuna, armed with a mace of iron; as Arjuna cut that mace in seven pieces with his arrows, Citrasena, by means of his science, concealed himself from the view of Arjuna, and thus continued to fight with him; but Arjuna destroyed his power of concealing himself by shooting at him with his celestial arms guided by the sound (cabdaredham samacritya). Then Citrasena showed himself to Arjuna, reminding him of his being his friend, and there was put an end to the battle (III, 245). Citrasena related to Arjuna that, staying in his abode, he had become acquainted with the purpose of Duryodhana, etc., and had been requested by Indra to bring Duryodhana thither in chains together with his counsellors. Arjuna entreated him to set Duryodhana free, but, at the request of Citrasena, they left it to be decided by Yudhishthira; Yudhishthira then liberated all the Kauravas. The Gandharras went away with the Apsarases, and Indra revived the slain Gandharvas by sprinkling amrta upon them. Friendly admonished by Yudhishthira, Duryodhana, overwhelmed with shame, returned to his capital (III, 246). When Duryodhana, afflicted with grief, was approaching Hästinapura with his army, Karna congratulated him on the honourable victory over the Gandharvas (III, 247). Duryodhana told Karna that, as the Gandharvas had resorted to illusion and ascended the skies, he had been captured with his army, and that it was the Pandavas who had vanquished the Gandhurras (III, 248). Duryodhana continued his narrative and declared that he would stay there abstaining from food, and that the others, headed by Duhçasana, should go to Hastinapura. He then offered the royal power to Duhcāsana. Duhcāsana, his voice choked in tears, refused to accept it. Karna reproached them for weeping thus, and declared that the Pandavas, who resided in the dominions of Duryodhana and enjoyed happiness under his protection, only did their duty in liberating him (III, 249). Karna continued explaining his opinion, that those who resided in the king's realm should always exert themselves to the best of their ability for the king; if the Pandavas had not followed Duryodhana to the battle it would have been an improper act on their part. Duryodhana, firmly resolved to leave the world, desired not to rise from where he sat (III, 250). Cakuni reproached Duryodhana for his foolish despair, saying that he ought rather to reward the Pandacas by granting them their paternal kingdom. Duryodhana embraced Duhçasana, but did not waver from his purpose; he spread kuça grass on the earth, etc., and began to pray and worship mentally.- § 513: The Daileyas and Danaras who had formerly been vanquished by the gods and were dwelling in Pātāla, having ascertained Duryodhana's purpose, commenced a sacrifice with formulas, revealed by Brhaspati and Uçanas, according to the rites indicated in the Atharvaveda and the Upanishad, assisted by brahmans of rigid vows, well versed in the Vedas and the Vedānaas. After these rites were ended a sorceress (krtvā) arose, whom the Daityas caused to bring Duryodhana to them in the night (III, 251). The Danavas said to him: "Do not do such a rash act as the vow of starvation. The suicide ever sinks into hell (adho yāti), and is blamed . . . In days of old we had obtained thee by ascetic austerities from Mahecvara; the upper part of thy body is wholly made of vairas, and is, therefore, invulnerable to weapons of every description; the lower part of thy body was made of flowers by Devi herself . . . Brave kshatriyas, headed by Bhagadatta, will slay thy foes . . . In order to aid thee many Danavas (v. 15172: Daityas and Rakshanes) have been born on earth. Other Asuras will also possess Rhishma, Drona, Krpa, and others; possessed by those Asuras these heroes will abandon their kindness and fight with thy foes . . . We have already settled the means of slaying Arjuna; the slain Naraka has assumed the form of Karna; recollecting his former hostility he will encounter both Keçava (i.e. Krshna) and Arjuna, and vanquish Arjuna in battle. Indra in disguise will deprive Karna of his earrings and coat of mail. We also have appointed innumerable Daityas and Rākshasas, the so-called Samcaptakus, who will sluy Arjuna . . . Thou art ever our refuge, as the Pandavas are the refuge of the gods." Then the Danavas embraced and cheered him, and that very goddess (kṛtyā) carried him back to the spot where he had sat down intent upon putting an end to his life, and there she vanished. Now Duryodhana considered all as a dream, and thought he should defeat the Pandavas in battle. And also Karna, being possessed by the soul of Naraka, and the Samcuptakas, possessed by the Rakshasas, were desirous of slaying Arjuna; and Bhishma, Drona, Krpa, etc., influenced by the Danavas, were not so affectionate towards the Pandavas as they had been. Duryodhana did not tell anyone of this .- § 514: When the night had passed away Kurna again exhorted Duryodhana, and promised to slay Arjuna in battle. Duryodhana arose and arranged his army, and went to Hastinapura, accompanied by Karna, Çakuni, his brothers headed by Duhçasana and Bhuricravas, and Somadatta, and Bahlika (111, 252) .-§ 515: Karnadigvijaya (q.v.).— § 516: Duryodhanayajña (q.v.).-§ 517: Hearing the vow of Karna, Yudhishthira, filled with anxiety, made up his mind to abandon Draitavana. Duryodhana with his brothers, and Bhishma, Drona, Krpa, and Karna ruled the earth justly and worshipped the brahmans by sacrifices and profuse gifts (III, 257).

Gograhana ("the robbing of the kine"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): 1, 2, 328 (parva, i.e. Goharanaparvan).

Goharanaparvan ("the section relating to the robbing of the kine of Virāţa," the 55th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Gograhana). § 552: Meanwhile the spies of Duryodhana returned to Hastinapura and informed Duryodhana, who was sitting with Drona, Karna, Krpa, Bhīshma, his brothers, and the Trigartas, that they had not found out the Pandavas, but that Kīcaka (b) had been slain (IV, 25). Kārņa and Duhçāsana proposed that the other spies should be sent (IV, 26). Drona said: "People like the Pandavas never perish, let the abode which the Pandavas are to occupy now be settled" (IV, 27). Bhishma applauded Drona (IV, 28). Krpa recommended precautions (IV, 29). The Trigarta king, Suçarman, supported by Karna, proposed to invade the city of Virata and to rob his kine and wealth, and thus to take revenge for the invasions of the Matsyas headed by Kicaka. Duryodhana caused Duhçāsana to array their forces. Suçarman set out towards the south-east on the seventh day of the dark fortnight, and the Kauravas on the eighth day (IV, 30). After Kīcaka had been slam, Virāţa began to rest his hopes on the Pandavas. His brothers, Catanika and Madiraksha, and the king himself, and Süryadatta and Çankha, the eldest son of Virața, put on their coats of mail. Virața also caused Catanīka to order chariots for Kanka, Vallava, Tantripāla, and Dämagranthi (i.e. Yudhishthira, Bhīmasena, Nakula, and Sahadeva in disguise) (IV, 31). The Matsyas overtook the Trigartas shortly before sunset. Catanīka and Viçalāksha penetrated into the heart of the Trigarta host. Virata, with Süryadatta in his van and Madirāksha in his rear, began a single combat from chariots against Sucarman (IV, 32). The night interrupted the battle for a while, but it began once more when the moon arose. Suçarman and his younger brother made Virūţa prisoner, and the Matsyas began to fly; Bhīma would uproot a tree, but was prevented by Yudhishthira, lest the people should recognize them; then Bhima, with Nakula and Sahadeva as protectors of his wheels, rushed against Suçarman, and the Matsya warriors, Virata's son, and Yudhishthira, etc., followed him; the charioteer of Suçarman was dragged to the ground. Madiraçva came to the aid of Bhīma. Virāta leapt down from the chariot of Suçarman, seizing the mace of the latter, and ran in pursuit of him; Sucarman was seized by Bhima, but set free by Yudhishthira (IV, 33). The Pandavas passed the night on the field of battle honoured by Virāta. As proposed by Yudhishthira, Virāta ordered messengers to proclaim the victory in the city. The messengers repaired to the city that very night, and at sunrise they proclaimed the victory at the city gates (IV. 34). Meanwhile Duryodhana, etc. (a), invaded the Matsya country and took away the kine. Hearing this, Bhūminjaya (i.e. Uttara), who had been left by the king in the empty city (IV, 35), and whose charioteer had been slain in a great battle, followed the advice of Krshna (who had been instigated by Arjuna) and sent Uttarā (IV, 36), who prevailed upon Brhannala (= Arjuna in disguise) to become the charioteer of Uttara. Uttara and her maidens asked Arjuna to bring fine clothes for their dolls when he had vanquished the Kurus (IV, 37). Seeing the host of the Kurus, Uttara became agitated with fear and jumped down from the chariot and began to flee, but was seized by Arjuna and made to hold the reins, while Arjuna had to fight (IV, 38). Bhishma, Drona, etc., suspected the comer to be Arjuna, and many portents were explained by Drona in that sense. Karna blamed Drona, and Duryodhana said that if it were Arjuna the Pandavas must go into exile for twelve more years (IV, 39). Having reached the camī tree, Arjuna ordered Uttara to fetch the weapons of the Pandavas, including Gandiva, which were deposited there (IV, 40). Believing that a corpse had been tied up in the tree, Uttara refused, but as Arjuna said: "There are only bows in that tree and no corpse," he climbed up and unwrapped and untied the bows (IV, 41). Arjuna explained to him to whom the different bows belonged, first mentioning the Gandiva (c), which is honoured by the gods, the Danavas, and the Gandharvas (IV, 42-43). He then revealed to Uttara that they were the Pandavas and confirmed it by telling his ten names  $(\beta)$ (IV, 44). Arjuna took off the bracelets from his arms, etc., recalled to his mind all his weapons, and twanged the Gandiva with a dreadful sound, whence the Kurus knew that he was Arjuna, then he comforted Uttara by mentioning his former exploits ( $\gamma$ ) and his preceptors in arms ( $\delta$ ) (IV, 45). Having taken down the banner with the figure of a lion he set up his own flagstaff bearing the figure of an ape with a lion's tail, which was a celestial illusion (māyā) contrived by Vicvakarman himself, for as soon as he thought of the gift of Agni. Agni ordered the superhuman creatures to take their usual place on that banner, which then fell down from the air on his chariot (read rathe with B.). Drona concluded from various omens that it was Arjuna (IV, 46). Duryodhana repeated to Bhishma, Drona, and Krpa, his and Karņa's opinion, that Arjuna must have broken his pledge, and asked Bhishma to calculate the time. Karna blamed Drona for praising Arjuna (IV, 47), and declared that he would throw Arjuna down from his chariot that very day (IV, 48). Krpa blamed Karna and warned him from fighting alone with Arjuna, mentioning his exploits ( $\epsilon$ ); they ought all to fight with Arjuna and not Karna alone (IV, 49). Acvatthaman blamed Karna for his vain boast and declared that he would not fight with Arjuna (IV, 50). Bhīshma tried to mediate between Acvatthaman and Krpa on one side and Karna on the other side; he was of opinion that fight they must, and therefore this was not the time for quarrel. "The Brahmastra and the Vedas are never to be seen combined anywhere else than in Drona (and Açvatthaman)." He was supported by Acvatthaman and Duryodhana. Drona said: "Let such arrangements be made that Ariuna may not be able to approach Duryodhana in battle, and that Duryodhana may not be captured by the foe" (IV, 51). Having calculated the time ("an excess of five months and twelve nights in thirteen years"), Bhishma declared that the Pandavas had not broken the pledge. Duryodhana said: "I will not give back the kingdom to the Pandavas." Bhishma proposed that Duryodhana should proceed towards the capital with onefourth of the army, and that one-fourth should escort the kine, while he, Drona, Karna, Açvatthaman, and Krpa should withstand the foes. This proposal was accepted; Bhishma placed Drona in the centre, Acvatthaman on the left wing, Krpa on the right wing, and Karna in the van, and would himself stand in the rear (IV, 52). Drona recognized the top of Arjuna's banner, etc. Arjuna directed Uttara to the spot where Duryodhana was; the soldiers became so confounded that they could not even fly, and the kine turned back along the southern road (IV, 53). As Arjuna was advancing towards Duryodhana the Kurus fell upon him, especially Karna, who was supported by Citrasena, Sangramajit (the brother of Karņa), Çatrusaha, Jaya, and Vikarņa; Vikarna fled; Catruntapa and many others were slain by Arjuna, so also Sangramajit; at last Karna took to flight (IV, 54). Duryodhana, etc., attacked Arjuna; Arjuna shot at Drona, Duhsaha, Açvatthaman, Duhçasana, and Krpa, and wounded Bhishma, Duryodhana, and Karna. Then Arjuna described to Uttara the banners, etc., of Krpa, Drona, Acvatthaman, Duryodhana, Karna, and Bhishma (IV. 55). Indra, the gods, the Vicyas, the Acvins, the Maruts, the Yakshas, the Gandharvas, the Mahoragas, the Nagas, the Rakshasas, the serpents, the Pitrs, and the maharshis came to see the combat, likewise, sitting on the chariot of Indra, king Vasumanas, etc. (ζ); also Agni, Çivu, Soma, Varuna, Prajāpati, Dhātr, Vidhātr, Kubera, Yama, Alambusha, Ugrasena, Tumburu, etc., came there (IV, 56). Arjuna attacked Krpa, announced his name, and blew the Devadatta; at last Krpa was led away by his soldiers (IV, 57). Drona attacked Arjuna; Arjuna said: "I will not strike thee unless thou strikest me first"; with his own weapons Arjuna baffled the Aindra, Vayavya, and Agneya weapons, which were shot by Drona; a voice was heard in the sky applauding Drona; then Acvatthaman attacked Ariuna, which gave Drona an opportunity to leave the field (IV, 58). Acvatthaman cut off the string of the Gandiva and was applauded by the gods, and by Drona, Bhīshma, Karna, and Krpa. Arjuna attached a fresh string to the Gāṇḍīva. As Açvatthāman's arrows became exhausted Karna attacked Arjuna (IV, 59), who challenged him to a single combat and rebuked him, because he had fled after the slaughter of his younger brother. At last Karna, wounded, fled in a northern direction (IV, 60). Then Arjuna ordered Uttara to take him to Bhīshma; Uttara became afraid and was comforted by Arjuna (d), who enumerated some of his exploits and weapons. Duhçasans, Vikarna, Duhsaha, and Vivimcati rushed towards Arjuna; Duhçasana fled; Vikarna fell down; Duhsaha and Vivimcati were taken away by their warriors (IV, 61). At last the Kauravas fied (IV. 62); Duryodhana, Karna, and Duhçasana attempted in vain to defeat Arjuna (IV, 63). Then Bhishma and Arjuna fought with the Prajapatya, Aindra, Agneya. Raudra, Kaubera, Vāruņa, Yāmya, and Vāyavya weapons; the Gandharva Citrasena showed the two combatants to Indra, who showered celestial flowers down upon them:

at last Bhishma, wounded, lost consciousness and was led away by his charioteer (IV, 64). Duryodhana and then Vikarna attacked Arjuna; Vikarna run back and ascended the chariot of Vivimçati; Duryodhana was wounded and fled. and so did all the warriors (IV, 65). Stung by the censure of Arjuna, Duryodhana returned, and Karna, Bhishma, Drona, Krpa, Vivimcati, and Duhcasana rushed forwards to protect Duryodhana. Arjuna employed the weapon Sammohana which he had obtained from Indra, and blew his conch so that the Kurus were deprived of their senses. Then he caused Uttara to take away the white garments of Drona and Krpa, the yellow ones of Karna, and the blue ones of Durrodhana and Acvatthaman, but not those of Bhishma, because he had not been stupefied. Arjuna wounded Bhishma, who told Duryodhana to go back to his city, which they all did; Arjuna followed them for a while and worshipped Bhishma, Drona, Acvatthaman, and Krpa; then he, with an arrow, broke the crown of Duryodhana and blew the Devadatta. Then he ordered Uttara to turn back. The gods returned to their respective abodes (IV, 66). A large number of Kuru soldiers issuing from the forest stood before Arjuna with joined palms and were spared. Arjuna said to Uttara: "Do not eulogize the Pandavas, but say that the feat is thy own." Then he replaced the weapons on the cam? tree; the monkey ascended to the sky, together with the other creatures on the flagstaff, the illusion (māyā) melted away, and Uttara's own banner was replaced upon the chariot. Arjuna entered the city in the guise of Brhannalä, having sent the cowherds to announce the victory (IV, 67). Virāța entered his city, followed by the four Pandavas, and dispatched an army to protect Uttara, though Yudhishthira said that, protected by Brhannala, he was able to vanquish even the gods, the Asuras, the Siddhas, and the Yakshas. Meanwhile the messengers of Uttara came and Virāţa ordered the highways to be decorated, etc., and began to play at dice with Yudhishthira, who again repeatedly praised Brhannelä. Virāţa struck Yudhishthira with a die, but the blood was prevented from falling on the ground and was washed away by Krshna, who also, at the injunction of Yudhishthira, let Uttara enter alone, that Brhannala should not see him bleeding. Uttara prevailed upon Virāţa to ask Yudhishthira's When the bleeding had stopped, Brhannala entered (IV, 68). Uttara said: "All this has been accomplished by a devaputra ('son of a deity') who then disappeared." Arjuna gave to Uttara the garments he had brought (IV, 69).

[Grdhra - gomāyu - samvāda(h)] (" the discourse between a vulture and a jackal"). § 653b (Apaddh.): Bhishma related: The young child of a brahman died and was taken to the burning-place; a vulture caused the lamenting kinsmen to leave the child, as the sun was soon to set, saying that the child could not be revived by their lingering. A jackal, black as a raven, rebuked them for not waiting till the sun had set, as the child might possibly revive. The vulture and the jackal alternately endeavoured to persuade them. The jackal mentioned that by Rama's [i.e. Daçarathi's] slaying the Cadra named Cambuka, a brahmana child was restored to life; similarly the son of R.-r. Cveta. The vulture said that if only Rudra, etc. (a), would grant him a boon, the child might come back to life, and mentioned the spirits and Y. and Ra., etc., who haunt the burning-place, while the jackal reminded them that it was here on this "quiet and peaceful" spot that the Pitrs by thousands took leave of the world. The jackal and the vulture continued to dispute, exhausted with hunger and thirst, wishing to get opportunity of devouring the child. Then Cankara (i.e. Cira) exhorted by his consort came, and, taking up a quantity of water in his hands, restored the child to life for a hundred years, and to the jackal and the vulture he granted a boon, in consequence of which their hunger was appeared. [Guruçishyasamvāda] ("discourse between a preceptor and his disciple"). § 782g. (Anugītāparvan): Krshņa said: Asked by his disciple "Whence am I? whence art thou?" etc., the preceptor said: This was declared by Brahmán himself to R.; it was known to the conclaves of Si. in the ancient kalpas. In days of old R. Brhaspati, etc. ( $\delta$ ) assembled together for asking one another, tired with their acts; placing R. Angirasa at their head, they beheld, in the abode of Brahman, Brahman free from sin, and were instructed by him about how a good man should act, about Emancipation, etc. "Truth is the universe of being," light, ether, sun, wind, Indra and Prajapati are not seen as long as one has not attained to Adhyatma; religion has faith (çraddha) for its indication; the number of elements (tattva) are twentyfour and one more (XIV, 35). Brahmán discoursed on the city of nine gates, the three qualities, etc., the qualities belonging to darkness (birth as Candalas, etc.); R., Mu., and D. become deluded, desirous of pleasure (XIV, 36). Brahmán discoursed on passion (XIV, 37) and sattva (XIV, 38); the qualities are not completely separated from one another, etc. (XIV, 39); from the unmanifest first sprang the great soul, the source of all intelligence, the source of all qualities, called Mahan atma, Vishnu, Jishnu, Cambhu, Buddhi, etc., pervading everything in the universe, stationed in the heart of all, endued with minuteness, lightness, and affluence (prapti); this is said to be the first creation (XIV, 40); the great (Mahan), who was first produced and called Ahankara, is the second creation, the source of all creatures, a god, the creator of gods, etc. (XIV, 41); from Ahankara was born the five great elements; the pranae, etc.; the eleven organs sprung from Ahankara:—

Entity (bkātas).	On the Self (adhystman).	Anong Objects (adhibhutam).	Anone Gods (adhidairatam).

Three are the seats of all existent objects: land, water, and ether; the mode of birth is fourfold (from eggs, germs, filth, or wombs) (specification); etc.; on the means of attaining to Brahmán; on the body; the emancipated one is Vishinu, etc. (e); † him praise brahmans, D., As., Y., Pç., P., bird's, Rā., Bh., and M.-r. († v. 1169) (XIV, 42); the kehatriya, elephant, lion, sheep, snake, bull, and male are of middle quality [i.e. rajas]; the nyagrodha, etc. (() are the foremost among trees; Himavat, etc.  $(\eta)$  are the foremost among mountains; M. are the foremost of the gange, etc.  $(\theta)$ ; [in v. 1201 it is Vayu who resides in the skin and is employed in the perception of touch, etc.] (XIV, 43); the day was first, then arose the night, etc.; the months are said to begin with the bright fortnights; the constellations begin with Cravana; the seasons with winter (cicira), etc. (1) (XIV, 44); on the wheel of life (XIV, 45); on the duties that men should observe (XIV, 46); on renunciation. knowledge, and power (XIV, 47); on the different conceptions of Brahman (a tree, a forest, unmanifest, etc.); it is impossible to attain to Purusha by any other means than goodness: some assert the unity of Kshetrajña and sattea; this is not correct; the relation of Purusha to sattva is like that of the gnat to the udumbara, or that of water-drops on the leaf of a lotus. The R. once more asked (XIV, 48) about the diversities of practice observed by men, and about the connection between the Kehetrajña and sattva (XIV, 49). Brahmán, quoting what was said by a preceptor to a disciple, said that abstention from harming any creature is the foremost of all duties, and the relation between sattra and Kehetrajña (Purusha) is that of the object (vishaya) to the subject (vishayitva), or like that of the matter to the maker, or like that of a lamp (with oil and wick) to him who lights it; sattva is manifest, while Purusha is unmanifest; knowledge is indispensable for attaining to felicity; from pradhana develops mahat, from mahat ahankara, from ahankara the five elements; the qualities of the elements are the following:-

ether (space) wind light water earth 10	smell 1. agreeable 2. disagreeable 3. sweet 4. sour 5. pungent 6. diffusive 7. compact 8. oily 9. dry 10. clear	taste taste taste 1. sweet 2. sour 3. pungent 5. astringent 6. saline		ispa ispa ispa ispa ispa ispa ispa dark red dark red blue yellow grey(?) short long minute gross square	1. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4. 4.	touch touch touch touch 1. rough 2. cold 3. hot 4. tender 6. hard 8. smooth 9. slippery 7. oily 10. painful 5. clear 11. soft	٠; ٤٤ ٤٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩ ٠٩	sound. sound. sound. sound. sound. 1. Space (ether) is the highest of the elements > (i.e. above it is) ahankara > buddhi > alman (the soul) > the unmanifest avyakiam > Purusha (XIV, 50). Brahman said: The body is called the carriage of Bráhman, on which the individual soul drives about; the senses are the steeds; the mind is the chariotecr, called also the bhūtātman (the individual soul), because it is the ruler of the elements (bhutani); the reins are the buddhi, called also kshetrajna (the individual soul), because it "proclaims power." The order of the dissolution is: 1, the creatures; 2, their qualities; 3, the elements; D., men, G., Pc., As., and Rä. have all sprung from Nature (evabhavatah), and not from actions, nor from a cause; [the elements are called] the brahmans, who are creators of the universe [and] are born here again and again; all that springs from them is dissolved in those very five great elements like billows in the ocean; [beyond] those elements that compose the universe (vicvasrabhyas tu bhūtebhyah, i.e. the gross elements) are the five great elements (i.e. the subtle elements; read obhutas with B.), and higher than these is the way of the emancipated (read mukto with B.); Prajapati created all this by the mind alone; in the same manner R. attained to [the status of] D. by the aid of penance; (the wonderful effects of penanco, by which one may be cleansed from the most horrible sins, etc.; men, P., deities, etc., have been crowned with success by penance alone); different degrees of bliss after death (Prajapati; the great highest regionmahantam lokam uttamam; the unmanifest accumulation of happiness-sukhopacayam avyaktam; the unmanifest, i.e. the highest region of the great ones-avyaktam mahatam lokam uttamam), according as one performs acts with expectation, being full of egoism (ahankāra-samāyuktāḥ), or is devoid of selfishness (nirmamāḥ), and freed from egoism (nirahankṛtāḥ) through yoga; freed from darkness and passion and adhering only to goodness, one becomes released from every sin and creates all things: such a one should be known to be [perfect] kshetrajña: he who knows him knows the Veda; that which begins with the unmanifest and ends with the gross qualities (oviceshantam), has ignorance for its indication; selfishness (mama) is death, the reverse (na mama) is the eternal [Bráhman]; the high-minded ancients never applaud action: by action a creature is born with body; the indication of tranquillity is like what takes place in a dream; this is the goal of the emancipated ones who are intent on knowledge. The precentor said: Thus addressed by Brahmán. Mu. acted accordingly and attained to felicity (lokam). Krohna said: The pupil acted accordingly and then attained to emancipation

[Hamsakākīyopākhyāna(m)] ("the story of the crow and the swans"). § 606 (Karnap.): There lived on the other side of the ocean a rich raiçya with many children, kind to all creatures. A crow lived upon the refuse of the dishes set before these children. The crow, becoming arrogant, came to disregard all birds. Once, certain swans, having their abodes in the Manasa lake, came to that side of the ocean. The crow challenged their leader, saying that he would display 101 different kinds of motion, doing every 100 yojanas in a separate kind of motion: rising up and swooping down, etc. One of the swans said that they knew but that one kind of motion that all birds know, at which the assembled crows laughed aloud. The swans in vain tried to dissuade the crow. They began to fly. Beholding the diverse kinds of flight of the crow, the crows loudly rejoiced, while the swans laughed in mockery. For a moment the swan, with that one kind of slow motion, seemed to yield to the crow. As the swan flew westwards to the ocean, the crow was anxious and became almost senseless at not seeing any islands or trees whereon to perch when tired. At last the swan asked: "What is this kind of flight that thou hast now adopted? thou touchest the waters with thy wings and beak repeatedly." The crow suddenly fell down, and imploring the swan, prevailed upon him to take him on his back and carry him to the shore, and promised never to disregard others.

Hanumad-Bhima-samyada(h) ("conversation between Hanumat and Bhīma"). § 425 (Bhīmakadalīkhandapraveça): Hanumat said that he was the son of Vayu with the wife of Keçarin, and the friend of the Sun's son Sugriva, who, together with Cakra's son Valin, used to be waited upon by all monkeys; further, that Sugriva had been driven out by his brother, and dwelt for a long time with Hanumat at Rshyamuka, when Rāma Dāçarathi, who was Vishņu in human shape, with his wife and younger brother resided in the Dandaka forest, and the Rakshasa Ravana carried away Sita, Rama's queen, from Janasthana, assisted by the Rakshasa Marica, in the form of a door marked with gems and gold (III, 147). Rama slew Valin and installed Sugriva in the kingdom; Sugriva sont monkeys to inquire after Sītā, and according to the communications of the vulture Sampāti, Hanāmat crossed the ocean, extending over 100 yojanas, saw Sitā in the abode of Rāvaņa, burnt Lanka, and returned to Rama. Rama constructed a bridge across the deep, and, followed by myriads of monkeys, he slew Ravana, his brother, sons, and kindred, together with all the Rakshasas, and installed the pious Rākshasa chief Vibhīshaņa in the kingdom in Lankā, and then returned with Sitā to his city Ayodhyā, and was established in the kingdom. Rama granted to Hanamat that he should live as long as the history of Rama's deeds is remembered on earth. Rāma went to his own abode after having reigned 11,000 years. From that time all excellent objects of entertainment were, through the grace of Silā, supplied to Hanumat, who constantly stayed there hearing the deeds of Rama sung by Apsarases and Gandharvas (cf. v. 11,323). He had obstructed this path of the gods to Bhima with the view that none might defeat or curse him (III, 148).- § 426: When Bhima asked Hanumat to show him the form he had when crossing the ocean, Hanûmat declared this to be impossible, as all things diminish according to the different yugas, even the Siddhas, gods, and great rshis. Then he described the Krtayuga (b) and the Treta (q.v., § 427), Dvapara (q.v., § 428), and Kaliyuga (q.v., § 429).—§ 430: Hanumat was prevailed upon to grant the request of Bhima (see § 426), and showed himself as great as the Vindhya or the Mainaka mountain, and said that he might become as long as he wished; he had himself been able to slay Ravana, but would not obscure the glory of Rāma. He pointed out to Bhīma the way to the Saugandhikavana and the garden of Kubera, which was guarded by Yakshas and Rakshasas, and warned him against plucking the flowers himself, delivering a discourse upon the duties of the four castes, etc. (III, 150).

Sugrīva, however, said that he had despatched monkeys in all directions to find out Sītā. After a month those who had been sent to the north, the east, and the west returned. After two months Hanūmat, Angada, etc., returned from the south, after having pillaged Madhuvana (b). Hanūmat told that in a cavern of the palace of Maya the ascetic Prabhūvatī had shown them the way; on the shore they had seen the mountains Sahya, Malaya, and Dardura, then they had met Sampāti, the brother of Jaṭāyu(s) (o), and had informed him of everything; Sampāti then had directed them to Lankā (d), whereafter Hanūmat had crossed the ocean and slain the Rākshasī of the water, and had been recognized by Sītā from the words of Avindhya; Sītā had given him a jewel as a credential and told him, as a token, that Rāma on the mountain Citrakūṭa had shot a blade of grass at a crow; Hanūmat then had caused himself to be seized by the soldiers of Rāvana, and set fire to Lankā.

[Haranaharanaparvan] ("the section relating to the handing over the gift of honour," the 17th of the minor parvans of the Mhbhr.). § 253: Kṛshṇa said that Arjuna had not insulted their family, but had rather enhanced their respect, and prevailed upon them that they, by conciliation, brought Ariuna back to Dvaraka, where he was united in marriage with Subhadra and passed a whole year. The last time of his exile he passed in Pushkara. After the twelve years were complete he came back to Khandavaprastha-Draupadī at first was jealous, but then embraced Subhadrā. Krshna visited them at Indraprastha with Rama, Akrura Danapati (the senapati of the Vrshnis), Anadhrshti, Uddhava (a disciple of Brhaspati himself), Satyaka and Satyaki, and Krtavarman Satvata, and Pradyumna, Camba, Nicatha, Canku, Carudeshna, Jhillin, Viprthu, Sarana, Gada, etc., bringing with them many nuptial presonts. Yudhishthira sent the twins out to receive them. Krshna gave them 10,000 kine from the country of Mathura, and Balhika horses as kanyadhana, etc. Rāma gave Arjuna as a wedding present (pāṇigrahaṇika) 1.000 elephants. Having spent many days in sports and merriment there, the Vrshnis returned to Dvaravati with Rama in the van, carrying with thom the gems that had been given them by Yudhishthira. But Krehna romained with Arjuna at Indraprashtha, and they went a-hunting over the borders of the Yamuna. Subhadra brought forth Abhimanyu, so called because he was fearless (abhi) and wrathful (manyumat, v. 8027). Upon his birth Yudhishthira gave away 10,000 kine and nishkas to the brahmans. The child became the favourite of Vasudeva, etc., and acquired from his father the Dhanurveda (b). - Pāncalī (Krshņā, v. 8045) also obtained five sons (see § 159): Prativindhya, Sutasoma, Crutakarman, Catanika, Crutasena. They were born each at the interval of one year. Their jatakarman, cada, and upanayana were performed by Dhaumya. After having studied the Vedas they acquired from Arjuna knowledge of all weapons celestial and human (I, 221).

Hemakūta. § 390b (Tirthayātrāp.): On the mountain H. the utterance of words (so PCR., who follows the various reading cited by Nil., "vācī yatra bhavan," instead of "vātābaddha bhavan") caused the gathering of clouds and stones by thousands. There the recitation of the sacred scriptures was heard, but nobody was seen; in the evening and the morning there was seen fire, and biting flies would interrupt the austerities. Lomaca explained that formerly on this Rehabhakuta (i.e. Hemakuta) dwelt a great and resentful rehi, who was many hundred years old, and was named "Dalabha. When practising austorities he had been spoken to by others, and in wrath he ordered the mountain to throw stones on him who should utter any word there, and forbade the wind to make any noise. Therefore, as soon as a man utters any word here he is forbidden by a roaring cloud. Formerly, when the gods came to the Nanda, many men came to see them, but the gods with Indra at their head did not like to be seen, and therefore they rendered the spot inaccessible by raising obstructions in the form of mountains, and from that day onwards men could not see that hill, far less ascend it. Lomaça further said: "Here all the gods performed the best sacrifices, and the marks thereof may be seen to this day, the grass resembling kuça grass, and many trees resembling yapas; the gods and rshis dwell there to this day, and it is their fire which is seen in the evening and the morning. By bathing here one's sins are destroyed": III, 110, 9969 (parvatam, near the River Nanda and Aparananda, visited by Yudhishthira, etc., on his tirthayātrā).—§ 459 (Mārkandeyas.): III, 188, 12917 (parvatam, seen by Mārkandeya in the stomach of Nārāyana).—§ 574 (Jambūkh.): VI, 6 $\beta$ , 198 (the second of the aix varshaparvatāh of Jambūdvīpa), 202 (beyond H. lies Harivarsha), 236 (identified with Kailāsa, q.v.), ( $\theta$ ), 246 (inhabited by Guhyakas).

[Hidimbavadhaparvan] ("the section relating to the killing of Hidimba," the 9th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.) (of. Hidimba). § 214 (cf. 1II, 553 ff.): Not far from that place dwelt on a çala tree the Rakshasa Hidimba, a cannibal with eight long and sharp-pointed teeth, etc. Scenting the odour of man, he sent his sister Hidimba to slaughter them and bring them unto him. She fell in love with Bhima, and, assuming a beautiful form, she asked him to become her husband, and promised to rescue him and his brothers and mother from her brother, but Bhima ("neither men nor Gundharras, nor Yakshas are able to bear my might," v. 5960) refused to awaken them (I, 152). Seeing that his sister did not return soon enough, Hidimba proceeded quickly to the spot, and, abusing his sister, he rushed at her, but was seized by Bhima and dragged to a distance, lest his yells should awaken the brothers of Bhima; fighting they broke down the trees, etc., and at those sounds the Pandaras woke up with their mother, and saw Hidimba sitting before them (1, 153). She made herself and her love for Bhima known to them. Arjuna offered to assist Bhima; but Bhima refused. Arjuna then said: "The morning twilight is about to set in; during the twilights Rakshasas become stronger; kill him without delay." Then Bhima throw the Rukshasa to the ground, and he, dying, sent forth a terrible yell; then he doubled up his body and broke it in the middle. Arjuna thought there was a town not far off. Thereto they proceeded, followed by Hidimba (I, 154). Bhima would also have slain Hidimba, but was prevented by Yudhishthira. It was agreed upon, that she should have Bhima for her husband, until she got a son, sporting with him during the day, but bringing him back every evening. She then flew away with him, and sported with him on mountains, etc., until she had brought forth (the Rakshasa women bring forth the very day they conceive (v. 6077) a hald-headed son, whom they, on account of his baldness, called Ghatotkaca (ghato hanyotkaca iti, v. 6079), who developed into a young man the very hour he was born, excelled all Piçacas, etc., in strength, and soon acquired high proficiency in all weapons. Hidimba then went away; and also Ghatotkaca, who promised that he would come when wanted for business, went away northwards. It was Indra who had created Ghafotkaca as an antagonist for Karna, in consideration of the latter's lance (I, 155). The Pandavas proceeded from forest to forest in the garb of ascetics, studying the Brahma Veda, and the Vedangas, and the niticastra, through the countries of the Matsyas, Trigartas, Pañcalas, and Kicakas. Then they met Fyāsa, who comforted them and led them into the town of Ekacakrā to the house of a brahman. He ordered them to wait here, till he came back, and then went away (I, 156).

Hradapraveçana(m) ("Duryodhana's entering the lake") § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 346 (parva, i.e. Hradapraveçaparvan).

[Hradapraveçaparvan] ("the section containing Duryodhana's entering the lake," the 81st of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Hradapraveçana). § 612: The followers of Çakuni attacked the Pāṇdavas; Arjuna and Bhīmasena came to the rescue of Sahadeva; Arjuna slew them; Duryodhana rallied the remnants of his chariots (many hundreds), etc., and urged them against the Pāṇdavas and Dhrahtadyumna; they were exterminated in a moment by the Pāṇdavas and the Sṛṇjayas. Only Duryodhana remained alive. Requested by Dhṛtarāshṭra, Saṇjaya recounted the numbers of the remnants of the Pāṇdava army. Duryodhana abandoned his slain steeds and fled away on foot without a companion, towards a lake, taking up his mace, recalling the words of Vidura. The Pandavas (boaded by Dhrshtadyumna) with Arjuna (with Gandiva) baffled the Kurus. In Duryodhana's army no great chariot-warrior was alive save Agratthaman, etc. (a). Urged by Dhrshtadyumna, Sātyaki was about to slay Sanjaya; but Vyūsa came and caused him to be let off alive. He met with Duryodhana, whom he told the state of things, and who asked him to inform Dhytarashtra. Then Duryodhana, having charmed the waters, entered the lake. Sanjaya then met with Accatthaman, etc. (a), and informed them; they fled away, at sight of the Pandavas, to the Kuru camp, taking Sanjaya up in the chariot of Arpa. The sun had set a little before. The outposts of the camp wept aloud. The old men proceeded towards the city with the princesses (description); also the camp-guards fled towards the city, and so did also the cowherds, etc., from fear of Bhimasena. Yuyutsu reflected (B). With the permission of Yudhishthira he supervised the removal of the ladies. The Having entered Hastinapura with the sun was setting. ladies, he informed Vidura ( $\gamma$ ); urged by Vidura, he passed that night in his own abode, while Vidura went to the cheerless mansion of Dhṛtarāshṭra (1X, 29). Requested by Dhrtarāshtra (8), Sanjaya related: The Pandaras wandered over the field in search of Duryodhana; tired, they took rest in their camp with all their soldiers. Then Agratthaman, etc. (a) proceeded towards the lake and arged Duryodhana to fight with them against Yudhishthira. Duryodhana said that he would rest for that night and fight the next morning. Agratthaman swore to slay the Pandavas and all the Pancalas in this night. Certain hunters who used every day to procure a basketful of meat for Bhimasena overheard the conversation between Duryodhana and Acratthaman, etc. (a), and informed Bhīmasena. The Pāṇḍavas ull (Arjuna, etc. (1) with Yudhishthira) started towards the lake (Draipayana); hearing the noise caused by them Acratthaman, etc. (a), took leave from Duryodhana and went away, and stopped under a banyan (1X, 30). Krshna advised Yudhishthira to slay Duryodhana by putting forth his own powers of illusion (ζ). Yudhishthira tauntingly addressed Duryodhana for having fled from battle  $(\eta)$ ; Duryodhana said that he had entered the lake not from fear, but in order to take rest. Yudhishthera asked Duryodhana to come out immediately and fight his foes. He answered that his kingdom might be taken by his foes, his own desire being to enter the woods and retire from the world (0): Yudhishthira taunted him for such an answer, refusing to take the kingdom in gift from one who was unable to retain it by might (IX, 31).

Indralokābhigamana ("Ārjuna's journey to the world of Indra"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 321 (parva, i.e. Indralokābhigamanaparvan).

[Indralokabhigamanaparvan] ("the section relating to Arjuna's journey to the world of Indra," the 34th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). § 335: After the Lokapalas had gone away. Arjung began to think of the chariot of Indra, which, guided by Mātali, came down full of swords, missiles, maces, thunderbolts, etc. (description), and great Nagas with fiery mouths, and drawn by 10,000 horses of golden hue, and with the flagstaff Vaijayanta (described). Matali, descending, invited him to ascend the chariot, as Indra waited to behold him, surrounded by gods, rshis, Gandharvas, and Apsarases. As that chariot cannot be obtained even by hundreds of rajasuyas and horse-sucrifices, and as even gods and Danavas are not competent to ride in it, and as he that has no ascetic merit is not competent even to see or touch it, Ariuna first let Matali ascend it and control the horses. Then he purified himself in the Gangā, repeated his prayers (japyam), gratified the Pitrs, and bade farewell to the Mandara mountain (b). Then he ascended, in the chariot, through the sky and beheld thousands of vimanas of extraordinary beauty; there was no sun or moon or fire, but they blazed in light of their own, generated by virtue and ascetic merit; and the stars, which from earth look small in consequence of their distance, but are very large, were seen by him in their places; and rajarshis who had attained siddhi (siddhah), and heroes fallen in battle, and those that had obtained heaven by tapas; and Gandharvas, and Guhyakas, and rehis, and Apsarases. Matali explained to him that the stars were virtuous persons (sukrtinah) stationed in their respective places (dhishnyoshu). At the gates he beheld Airavata with four tunks equal to Kailasa. Continuing along the path of the Siddhas, he passed through the regions (lokan) of [virtuous] kings, and thus passing through Svargaloka he beheld Amaravati (b), the city of Indra (III, 42).—§ 336: When Arjuna had entered the city, praised by Apearases, Gandharvas, Siddhas, great rshis, and gods, he, at the request of Indra, went to the large starry way (nakshatramarga) named Suravithi, where he met with the Sadhyas, Viçvas, Maruts, Açvins, Adityas, Vasus, Rudras, Brahmarshis, Rajarshis with Dilips at their head, Tumburu, Narada, Haha, and Huhu. Then he beheld Indra, eulogized by Gandharvas headed by Viçvavasu, etc., and was seated on Indra's own seat; and Gandharvas, headed by Tumburu, sang to them, and thousands of Apearases (enumeration of seventeen) (a) danced there (III, 43).- § 337: The gods and Gandharvas offered him arghya, etc., and caused him to enter the palace of Indra. There he received Indra's weapons, the thunderbolt (vajra) and lightning (acanth). At the request of Indra he dwelt there for five years, and learned the dance and music of the Gandharvas from Citrasena, whom Indra gave him as a friend, but he was longing for his brothers and Kunti and thirsting for revenge (III, 44).—§ 338: In the beginning, seeing that the eyes of Arjuna were fixed upon Urvaçi, Indra despatched Citrasena to Urvaçi, who gladly consented to choose Arjuna (b) for her lover (III, 45). Urvaci related to Arjuna that as he had looked on her only in a solemn assembly of celestials held on account of his coming, where the Rudras, Adityas, Aquins, Vasus, Maharshis, Rajarshis, Siddhas, Caranas, Yakshas, and Mahoragas (i.e. great serpents) were present, and the Gandharvas played the vinas, and the Apsarases danced, Indra had caused Citrasena to send her to him, and that she was herself in love with him. Arjuna declared that he regarded her as the wife of his guru, and that he had been gazing at her because she was the mother of the Paurava race. She replied that the sons and grandsons of Puru's race, that had come thither in consequence of ascetic merit, did all sport with the Apsarases without incurring any sin. But Ariuna swore that he regarded her as his mother. She then cursed him, saying that he should have to pass his time among females as a dancer and destitute of manhood, and then went away. Indra told him that this would come to pass in the thirteenth year of their exile, when they would live unknown to all, but having passed one year thus he would regain his manhood. The desire of the man that listens to this history of Arjuna never runs after lustful ends, etc. (III, 46) .--§ 339: One day the brahmarshi Lomaça in the course of his wanderings went to the abode of Indra. As Lomaca within himself wondered how Arjuna, being a kshatriya, had attained the seat of Cakra, who was worshipped by the gods themselves, Cakra, knowing his thoughts, explained to him who Arjuna (b) really was; that moreover the Asuras, the sons of Danu, named the Nirātakaracas, who dwell in Pātāla, proud of a boon they had acquired, were planning the destruction of the gods, and could not be slain by others than either Krehna (c) or Arjuna; but Madhusüdana (i.e. Kṛshṇa) should not be urged when the task was insignificant, lest his energy should consume the whole universe; therefore Arjuna should slay them. At the request of Indra, seconded by Arjuna, Lomaca went to the Kamyaka wood to Yudhishthira in order to bring him news about Arjuna and recommend him to visit the tirthas, and follow him and protect him from the Rakshasas (d) (III, 47).-§ 340: As Dhrtarüshira learnt from Dvaipāyana of Arjuna's arrival and stay at Indra's abode, he expressed his anxiety to Sanjaya (III, 48). Conversation of Sanjaya and Dhrtarashtra about Arjuna's encounter with Civa in the guise of a Kirāta, etc. (III, 49).—§ 341: During the five years of Arjuna's absence the Pandavas fed themselves and 10,000 endtaka brahmans, some with and some without fire, by killing deer, Yudhishthira going towards the east, Bhima towards the south, and the twins towards the west and north (III, 50).- § 342: Having heard of the way of life of the Pāndavas, Dhrtarāshtra expressed his anxiety before Sanjaya, fearing Bhims with his iron (çaikya) mace, etc. Sanjaya. commemorated how Krehna, Dhrehtadyumna, Virāta, Dhrehtaketu, and the Kaikeyas had visited the Pandavas in the Kamyaka wood, whose conversations Sanjaya had learnt through spies and formerly told Dhytardshira. Sanjaya further related that Krshns had consented to become the charioteer of Arjuna (cnumeration of kings seen by Krshna at the rājasāya) and to assist the Pāndavas in the battle, together with Rāma, Akrūra, Gada, Çūmba, Pradyumna, Āhuka, Dhrshtadyumna, and the son of Çiçupāla, and Yuyudhāna, and the Kaikeya and Pāncāla princes and the Matsya king, and Krshna had declared that Yudhishthira should, along with his brothers living at Hāstinapura, rule the carth (III, 51).

[Indra - Matanga - samvada(h)] ("the conversation between Indra and Matanga"). § 735b (Anuçasanik.): Bhishma said: Once a brahman obtained a son named Matanga, who, though procreated by a person of a different order, had, however, the rites of infancy and youth performed according to the ordinances laid down for brahmans. His father, desiring to perform a sacrifice, ordered him to collect the articles, and he set out riding in a car drawn by a young ass, that bore away the cur to its mother; Matanga repeatedly struck the animal with his goad on its nose; but the old she-ass consoled it, saying, "A Candala it is that is driving thee; there is no severity in a brahman." Asked by Matanga, the she-ass revealed to him that his father was a Cudra following the profession of a barber, who begat him upon a brahman woman excited with desire; "thou art, therefore, a Candala by birth." Matanga returned home, told his father what he had heard, retired to the forest, and began to undergo the austerest penances in order to acquire the status of a brahman, so that he scorched the very deities. Indra came and offered him boons, but the status of a brahman, he said, could not be won by penances (XIII, 27). Matanga then stood for 100 years on one foot. Indra came once more and said: "From the order of brute life one attains to the state of humanity; if born as a human being, one is sure to take birth as a Pukkaça or a Candala; after 1,000 years one attains to the status of a Cudra; then after 30,000 years that of a Vaicya; after a period that is sixty times longer, that of a kshatriya; after a period that is sixty times longer than this. to that of a fallen brahman; after a period 200 times as long, to that of a brahman living by the profession of arms; after a period 300 times as long, to that of a brahman reciting the Gayatri and sacred mantras; after a period 400 times as long, to that of a brahman conversant with the entire Vedas and the scriptures" (XIII, 28). Matanga then practised austerer penances, standing on one foot for. 1,000 years in yoga-meditation. Indra once more came and said the same. Matanga then repaired to Gaya, and there passed 300 years on one foot in yoga, and was reduced to only skin and hones, and dropped down on the ground from sheer exhaustion. Indra came quickly; now Matanga accepted the boons that he should be celebrated as chandodeva, and obtain the worship of all women, and his fame should become unrivalled in the three worlds (XII, 29).

[Indravijaya(h)] ("the victory of Indra"). § 555: Questioned by Yudhishthira about the misery endured by Indra and Cacī, Calva related: Once the Prajūpati Tvashtr. from antipathy to Indra, created a son who had three heads (one for reading the Vedas; the second for drinking wine; with the third he looked as if he were about to absorb the four quarters), colled Viçvarūpa. Beholding his austerities, Indra became alarmed, and in vain caused Apsarases to tempt him; then he slow him with his thunderbolt (thinking, "I shall afterwards perform some religious ceremony"), but was yet afraid of his appearance, and prevailed upon a carpenter to cut off the heads (promising, "in sacrifices men will give thee the head of the sacrificial animal as thy share"); out flow birds—(1) partridges, (2) sparrows and hawks, (3) quails. Then Tvashtr created Vrtra, who swallowed up Indra. The gods created Jymbhikā ("yawning"); Vytra yawnod (therefore yawn attaches itself to the living breath of animated beings), and Indra emerged. Tvashtr strengthened Vrtra; Indra returned; the gods consulted with the munis, and sitting on Mount Mandara, they thought of Vishnu (V. 9). Indra, with D. and R., repaired to Vishnu (b), who taught them, with R. and G., to make eternal friendship between Indra and Vrtra ("I may not be killed either by what is dry or wet, stone, wood, weapons, by day or night, by Indra or D.," said Vrtra). Indra then slow him in the evening with froth blended with the thunderbolt, in which Vishnu had entered. D., G., Y., Ra., M.-U., and R. glorified Indra. But Indra was overpowered by falsehood (anrta) and brahmanicide (brahmahatya), and became bereft of his consciousness, and lay concealed in water; the earth became treeless, the rivers were interrupted, the rains ceased (V, 10). Then R. and D. (also P. and G., ch. 16) crowned Nahusha as king of D., giving him their tapas: "whatever being may stand within thy sight-D., Du., Y., Ru., P., G., Bh.-thou shalt absorb his power." Nahusha then assumed a sensual turn of mind, amusing himself with Aps. and devakanyāh and Viçvavasu, Narada, G., and the six seasons, in Nandana, and on Kailasa, Himavat, Mandara, Cveta, Sahya, Mahendra, Malaya, etc. Ho ordained that Caci should wait upon him. Cacl (c) repaired to Brhaspati, who promised soon to unite her with Indra (V, 11). Nahusha became enraged; the earth, with As., G., K., M.-U., trembled; Nahusha reminded of Indra's behaviour towards Ahalva (d). etc.; at last the gods promised to bring him Cacī; but Brhaspati, as a brahman, would not abandon her, quoting a saying of Brahmán (s); he told her to ask for time from Nahusha, and so did the gods, led by Agni (V, 12). Caci obtained the boon from Nahusha, and returned to Brhaspati. D., with Agni, repaired to Vishnu, who said: "Let Indra offer sacrifice to me; having performed the horse-sacrifice, he will regain his dignity." D. and R. and Brhaspati proceeded to the spot where Indra was, performed a horse-sacrifice, and divided the brahmahatya among trees and rivers and mountains and earth and women; and Indra was free from fever, but vanished again from foar of Nahusha. Cacī worshipped Niçā (Night), who caused Upacruti to appear, and Cacī prayed to Upacruti (V, 13). Upacruti, followed by Caci, crossed the heavenly groves and many mountains and came to the northern side of Himavat, and thence to the sea; in an island there was a large lake with an assemblage of lotuses; there they found Indra in the fibres of a lotus-stalk, and, praising him. Cacī implored his help against Nahusha (V, 14). Indra said that Nahusha had been strongthened by the R. with the merits of offerings to D. and P. Cacī should tell Nahusha to visit her on a vehicle borne by R. Nahusha consented. Cacī prevailed upon Brhaspati to find out Indra, which he did by means of a sacrifice, prevailing upon Agni to search for him. Agni came back within the twinkling of an eye, having searched everywhere except in the waters, which he dared not enter ("fire rose from water, the kshatriya caste from the brāhmana caste, and iron from stone; the power of these, which can penetrate all other things, has no operation upon the sources from which they sprang") (V, 15). Brhaspati praised Agni (f) and strengthened him with hymns of the Veda; Agni then found out Indra (cf. ch. 14), and soon returned and informed Brhaspati. This came with D.-r. and G., and praised Indra by referring to his former deeds (that he had killed the great Asura Namuci and the Asura Cambara and Vala and Vrtra, as supra). Indra increased little by little, and having assumed his original form he grew strong, and asked what business yet remained, as he had killed Viçvarūpa and Vrtra. Brhaspati told him of Nahusha, who had been strengthened by the power of the D.-r., etc. (v. ch. 11), and how Nahusha, carried by M.-r., journeyed from world to world. Lp. Kubera and Yama Vaivasvata and Soma and Varuna came and rejoiced that Vicvaruna and Vrtia had been killed, and they and Agni promised him their assistance against Nahusha on the condition that they and Agni should have their shares in sacrifices, and that Kubera (g), Yama (h), and Varuna (i) should this day be crowned along with Indra (V, 16). While Indra, with Lp. and D., was considering the means of slaying Nahusha, the M.-r. Agastya came and rejoiced that Vicvarupa and Vrtra had been killed, and related how Nahusha had been hurled from heaven (Svarga). The D.-r. and B.-r., woary with carrying him, had questioned him if certain mantras (prokshane gavām) pronounced by Brahmán (so B.) were authentic (pramanam), to which Nahusha, bewildered by the dark principle (tamas), had answered in the negative; R. reproached him, as M.-r. had formerly declared them to be authentic. Nahusha touched Agastya's head with his foot, and instantly lost his power and luck (cri), and was agitated with fear. Then Agastya cursed him: "Fall thou from heaven, the effect of all thy good deeds (punys) has been exhausted; for 10,000 years thou shalt be a snake upon earth; then thou mayst come back to Svarga." D., M.-r., P., Y., Sp. (bhujagāh), Rā., G., devakanyāh, and the bands of Aps., and tanks, rivers, mountains, and the sea came and rejoiced (V, 17). Indra, glorified by G. and Aps., mounted Airāvata. Agni, the M.-r., Brhaspati, Yama, Varuṇa, and Kubera accompanied him. Indra went to the three worlds with D., G., and Aps., and was praised by Angiras (i.e. Brhaspati?) with hymns of the Atharvaveda. Then he granted Atharvangiras (—Angiras) the boon that his name would be connected with this Veda and that he would get a share in sacrifices. United with Cacī he protected the world virtuously (V, 18).

[Indrota-Pārīkshitīya(m)] ("the narrative of Indrota and Janamejaya Pārikshit"). § 652b (Apaddh.): Bhīshma said: There was, in days of yore, a king Pārikshit (! so B.; C. orio) Janamejaya; from want of judgment he became guilty of killing a brahman; then all the brahmans, with his priests, abandoned him; burning day and night with regret, the king retired into the woods; deserted by his subjects also, and consumed by repentance, he underwent the most rigid austerities. In order to purify himself of the sin of brahmanicide he interrogated many brahmans, and wandered from country to country over the whole earth. One day he met Indrota Çaunaka, who rebuked him for his brahmanicide and reminded him of the messengers of Yama in the abode of Yama (XII, 150). Janamejaya meekly listened to the reproof, saying that he was much afraid of Yama; he knew that, according to the Vedas, wretches like himself had forfeited all claim to the respect of the world, and had after death to dwell in hell like Pulindas and Cabaras (so C. and B.; PCR. Khasas), and he sought instruction from Indrota, who told him to repent and, knowing the Vedas, etc., act in such a way that the brahmans might not be angry with him; Caunaka said that his kinsmen and friends would call him sinful because he instructed Janamejaya. Janamejaya swore never again to injure the brahmans (XII, 151). Indrota discoursed to the repentant king on the means of cleansing himself, quoting a verse sung by Yayati about the sacredness of Kurukshetra, etc. (a), and recommending him to go to Mahāsaras, etc. ( $\beta$ ), quoting also a saying of Manu and a verse of Satyavat. Mahasaras, etc.  $(\gamma)$ , are so sacred that one guilty of freticide becomes cleansed at even 100 yojanas from them. Manu has said that by diving in water after thrice reciting the Aghamarshana [mantras] (v. the note of PCR., p. 498), one reaps the fruits of the final bath in a horse-sacrifice. The gods and Asuras in days of yore were instructed by M.-r. Brhaspati, the preceptor of the gods, how one should cleanse himself from sin. Indrota then assisted Janamejaya, cleansed of his sins, in the horse-sacrifice (XII, 152).

Jalapradānika, adj. ("relating to the gift of water to the deceased"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 348 (om parva, i.e. Jalapradānikaparvan).

[Jalapradānikaparvan] ("the section relating to the gift of water to the deceased," the 85th of the minor parvans of the Mhbhr.; cf. Jalapradānika). § 618: Janamejaya inquired of Vaiçampāyana as to what Dhṛtarāshṭra, etc. (a), did after the death of Duryodhana. Dhṛtarāshṭra's grief; Sañjaya comforted him, and suggested the performance of the obsequious rites of the fallen heroes. Dhṛtarāshṭra lamented (β); Sañjaya rebuked and consoled him (γ). Vidura addressed Dhṛtarāshṭra (XI, 1) and comforted him (δ) (XI, 2); charmed by Vidura's discourse, Dhṛtarāshṭra asked him to continue his observations on the vanity of human life; Vidura continued his discourse, and described human life as it runs (XI, 3) from the very beginning (XI, 4), comparing it to a wilderness abounding with dangers (XI, 5), explaining the comparison according to the religion of Moksha (XI. 6); asked by Dhrtarashtra, Vidura continued his discourse on human life (XI, 7). Dhriarashira swooned away, but was comforted by Vyasa, etc. (e), wept and lamented; Vyasa comforted him by explaining the secret history of the slaughter (he had seen the Earth in Indra's hall, complaining before the gods and D.-r. and Narada, and Vishnu consoling her, saying that Duryodhana would cause her burden to be lightened by a battle in Kurukshetra). etc. (5). Dhrtarashtra promised to live; Vyasa disappeared (XI, 8). Requested by Janamejaya (η), Vaiçampāyana related: After Duryodhana had been slain, and all the troops slaughtered, Sanjaya, deprived of his spiritual sight, came back to Dhrtarashtra, and recommended him to cause the obsequial rites to be performed. Dhrtarashtra swooned away: Vidura comforted him ("Time drags all kinds of creatures away," etc.) (XI, 9). Dhrtarashtra resolved to visit the field of battle with the Kuru ladies in his company. The Kuru ladies (Gandhari, Kunti, etc.) were placed in chariots under Vidura's supervision; the royal household, with a large number of the citizens, started from Hastinapura (XI, 10). Having proceeded a kroca, Dhrtarashtra met with Acvatthaman, etc. (4). Krps related to Gandhari the fall of Durvodhans in unfair fight, and their nightly attack on the camp of the Pandavas (1); then Acvatthaman, etc., took leave of Dhrtardshtra in order to conceal themselves from the wrath of the Pandavas, and urged their steeds towards the banks of the Ganga, where they separated from one another: Krps went to Hustinapura; Krtavarman to his own kingdom; Acvatthaman set out for the abode of Vyūsa; "before the sun rose: it was after this that the sons of Pandu encountered Acvatthaman and vanquished him" (XI, 11). Yudhishthira and his brothers set out in order to meet Dhytarashtra, accompanied by Krshna, etc. (x); they met the weeping ladies of the royal house on the way  $(\lambda)$ , and saluted Dhṛtarāshṭra, who reluctantly embraced Yudhishthira, and broke an iron statue of Bhima (that had been kept ready by Krshna), mistaking it for Bhīma himself; he then grieved for having slain Bhīma, fell down, and was raised by his charioteer Sanjaya; Krehna enlightened him, and told him not to cherish wrath (XI, 12). Certain maid-servants came and washed Dhytarashtra; then Krshna again addressed him, assuring him that the Pandavas were perfectly innocent (µ); then Dhrtarāshtra embraced Bhima, etc. (v) (XI, 13). Commanded by Dhrtardshtra, the Pāndava brothers with Krehna then proceeded to see Gandhārī, who wished to curse Yudhishthira. The great R. Vyāsa, capable of proceeding everywhere with the fleetness of the wind, and capable of socing the heart of every creature with his spiritual vision, understood her evil intentions, and having cleansed himself by the water of the Ganga, he suddenly appeared, and told her not to be angry with the Pandavas, but remember that she had every day for the eighteen days that battle lasted, when Duryodhana asked her to bless him, said: "Thither goes victory where righteousness is." Gandhart admitted that she and Dhrtardshtra should protect the Pandavas with as much care as Kunti herself protected them, the fault being with Duryodhana, etc. (F); but Bhīma's unfair combat with Duryodhana in the presence of Krahna moved her wrath (XI, 14). Bhima addressed Gandhari, and extenuated his fault in having slain Duryodhana unfairly ("Duryodhana had formerly himself vanquished Yudhishthira unfairly," etc.) (o). Gandhari then blamed Bhims for drinking Duncasana's blood, when Vrehasena had deprived Nakula of his steeds: Bhima denied that he had really drunk Duhcasana's blood; "Karna knew this well; seeing Nakula deprived by Vrshasens of his steeds, I caused the rejoicing brothers to be filled with dread; when the tresses of Draupadi were seized, I uttered certain words in rage; I dared not leave that vow unaccomplished lest I should be regarded as having swerved from the duties of a kshatriya." Gandhari then inquired after Yudhishthira, who appeared before her and invoked her curses on himself for his sinful slaughter of all her sons: Gandhari's glance (under the cloth that covered her eyes) blasted a nail of Yudhishthira's toe. Arjuna moved away to the seat of Krehna, and also the other Pandavas became restless. Gandhari then comforted the Pandavas and dismissed thom. They then met with their mother Kunti, who wep seeing their many sears. Draupadi wept for her children and Abhimanyu; Kunti consoled her, and so did Gandhar? (mentioning Vidura's predictions) (XI, 15).

Arjuna Kūrtavīrya, § 394), while Gādhi, the king of Kānyakubja, was dwelling in the wood, there was born to him a beautiful daughter. Satuarati, whom Reika Bhārgara asked in marriage. Gādhi said that, according to a family custom, the bridegroom must give a dowry of 1,000 brown steeds with a single sable car each (so PCR, translates ekatah cyamakarnanam, ef. V, 3740, and Galavacarita). Reika obtained them from Varuna (the spot where the horses appeared was thence named Acvatīrtha) and married Satuavatī in Kanyakubja on the Ganya, the very gods being compunions of the bridegroom (janyāh). Then his father Bhrqu came to see him and his wife, and being pleased with Satyavati, granted her the boon that a son should be born to herself and to her mother, telling her that during their season they should ombrace, her mother an accattha tree and horself an udumbara tree, and eat two pots of rice and milk (caru) which he had prepared, having ransacked the whole universe. Then Bhrgu disappeared. They, however, made an interchange both of the pots and of the trees which they embraced. Knowing this by his divine knowledge, Bhrgu came once more and told Satyarati that she had been deluded by her mother, and that therefore she would give birth to a brahman of kshatriya character (kshatravrtlih) and her mother to a kshatriya of brahman character (brahmanācārah). At her repeated entreaties, however, he granted her that not her son but her grandson should be of that description. The son of Satyavatī was J., who excelled many rshis in Vedic love (Vedadhyayanona), and to whom the whole Dhanurveda appeared spontaneously (pratyabhāt), and likewise the four kinds of weapon (astrāni): 111. 115. 10167.—§ 396: J. devoted himself to the study of the Veda and to penances. He married Ronaka, the daughter of king Prasenajit, and lived with her in his hermitage practising austerities. She gave birth to five sons, of whom Rāma was the youngest. Once when Renukā had been filled with desire, seeing the Marttikarata king Citraratha bathing, together with his wife, J. ordered his sons Rumanvat (the eldest), Syshena, Vasu, and Vicvavasu to kill their mother, but as they refused to do so he cursed them, so that they lost their senses and behaved like beasts and birds. Then he ordered Rama to do it, and he immediately severed her head with an axe, and then prevailed upon J, to grant him that Renukā might be restored to life and not remember that she had been slain, that he himself might not be affected by this sin, that his brothers might recover their former state, and that he himself might be unrivalled on the field of battle and obtain a long life: III, 116, 10183, 10185, 10188.— § 397: Once when the sons of J. had gone out, Arjuna Kartavirya, the lord of the country near the seashore (Anapapatih), came to the hermitage, and, though he was praised by Renuka, he carried away the calf of the homadhenu and pulled down the trees. J. told this to Rama, who then rushed towards Arjuna and cut down his 1,000 arms with his arrows and at last killed him. Then the sons of Arjuna came while Rama was away, and with their arrows killed J., who did not fight, but repeatedly shouted the name of Rama. When they had gone away, Rama returned to the hermitage: III, 116. 10196, 10197. - § 602 (Dronavadhap.): VII, 190 v. 8727.- § 606b (Paraçu-Rāma): VIII, 34, 1583 (Bhargavanam kule jatah, futher of Paragu-Rama).-§ 6386 (Ramop.): XII, 49, 1744 (Bhargavam, son of Reika and Satyavati), 1740 (father of Rama), 1761 (odhenvah . . . vateam), 1765 (slain by the sons of Arjuna Kartavirya; cf. §§ 395-7).-§ 665 (Mokshadh.): XII, 208., 7600 (Roikaeya putrah, one of the rshis of the north).—§ 702 (do.): XII, 293a, 10762 (had praised Vishnu).- § 721b (Viçvāmitrop.): XIII, 4, 245 (his birth; cf. § 395).—§ 733 (Rāmahrada): XIII, 25. 1734 (ogatine labhet, sc. by bathing in Mahahrada).- § 7450 (Cyavana-Kuçikasamv.): XIII, 55, 2912 (Bhrguçardulah, Reika will beget J., who will master the Dhanurveda).— § 750b (Bisastainyop.): XIII, 93a, 4416, (4444), (4464), (4495) (etymology of his name), (4521).-- § 7518 (Capathavidhi): XIII, 94a, †4550, (4571).- § 752b (Chattropanahotpatti): XIII, 95, 4606 (°eç ca samvadam Suryasya ca). Krodha, in the form of a brahman lady, then said to him that the saying was false that the Bhrgus were wrathful, since he had been subdued by J., and asked his forgiveness. J. said that as the milk had been destined to the Pitrs, Krodha ought to introduce himself to them. Through the curse of the Pitrs, Krodha became a mungoose until he had spoken disrespectfully of Dharma. Then he wandered about to sacrifices and other sacred places, employed in censuring great sacrifices, until he came and censured the horse-sacrifice of Yudhishthira, who was Dharma's self; then he became freed from his curse: XIV, 92, 2887, (2894). Jambū. § 574 i (Jambūkh.): On the south of Nīla and the north of Nishadha there is a huge eternal jambu tree (Eugenia jambolana, rose-apple), named Sudarçana, and adored by Si. and Ca.; it grants every wish, and after it Jambadvipa has its name; the tree is 1,100 yojanas high and touches the very heavens. The circumference of a fruit of that tree measures 2,500 cubits; when ripe the fruit bursts, and pours out a silvery juice which becomes a river, which passes round Meru and comes to the northern Kurus: the drinking of that juice conduces to peace of mind, no thirst is felt ever after, nor decrepitude. On that spot there is found a species of gold, called jumbunada, used for celestial ornaments and like the complexion of indragopaka (cochineal) insects. [Jambūkhandavinirmānaparvan  $({}^{\circ}va)$ ] ("the section relating to the measurement of Jambūkhanda," the 67th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. vinirmana). § 574: Janamejaya inquired how the Kurus and the Pundavas and Somakas fought on Kurukshetra. Vaiçampüyana began the description of the battle. The Pandavas occupied the western part, turned towards the east, beyond Samantapañcaka. The force was collected from the whole of Jambudvipa. Yudhishthira and Duryodhana fixed watchwords. Seeing Duryodhana (description), the Pancalas were filled with joy, and blew their conches, etc.; Arjuna and Krshna also blew their conches Devadatta and Pañcajanya, at which the Kurus were alarmed. Various ill omens were beheld. Both parties settled rules and made covenants regarding the different kinds of combat (VI, 1). Vyāsa visited Dhrtarāshtra, and offered to grant him spiritual vision that he might witness the battle. Dhrtarāshtra did not like to see the slaughter of his kinsmen. Vyāra then granted it to Sanjaya, that he might narrate everything to Dhṛtarāshṭra; weapons would not hurt him; he would come out of the battle with life. Vyāsa informed Dhytarashtra of the omens (a), and appealed to him for peace; but Dhrtarashtra urged the disobedience of his sons. Vyāsa enumerated to Dhrtarāshţra the omeus that indicate victory, and recommended negotiation, as victory was uncertain (VI, 2, 3). Then Vulsa departed. Seeing the many hundreds of millions of men that had come together at Kurujungala to lay down their very lives for the sake of the earth, Dhrtarashtra inquired of Sanjaya after the attributes of Earth, and the details about the countries and cities from which they had come. Sanjaya discoursed on the merits of the earth, and the various classes of creatures inhabiting it. Their twenty-four constituents are described as Gayatri (VI, 4). Dhrtarāshtra inquired about the rivers, mountains, and provinces of the earth, and their dimensions. Sanjaya spoke of the five elements and their attributes, earth being the foremost. Then he began the description of the dvipa of Sudarçana (VI, 5). Sanjaya discoursed on the six mountains (varshaparvatah, B.) that extend from the eastern to the western ocean, and are the resort of Si. and Ca.: Himavat, etc. (B), and the varshas between them—Bharata-varsha, etc. (γ); Malyarat, Gandhamadana; Moru (description); the four islands beside Meru-Bhadrūçea, etc. (δ); the bird Sumukha (b); on Moru sport D, G., As., Ra., and Aps., and Brahman, Rudra, and Cakra perform sacrifices; Tumburu, etc. (e), adore the gods with hymns; the seven Rehis and Kacyapa repair thither on every parvan-day (i.e. the day of full moon and that of new moon); upon the summit is Uçanas with the Daityas; the jewels, etc., come from Meru, one-fourth part being enjoyed by Kubera, who gives only one-sixteenth to men. On the northern side of Meru is a forest of karnikāras; there Paçupati (the creator of all things), together with his celestial attendants and Umd, sports, bearing a chain of karnikāra flowers reaching down to his feet, and his three eyes resembling three suns; the Siddhas can behold him, but not persons of wicked conduct; from the summit of that mountain Gangā (o) falls down. On the western side of south are both of the form of a bow. Amongst these seven varshas that which is further north excels the one to its immediate south in respect of longevity, stature, health, righteousness, pleasure, and profit. The huge mountains of Hemakuta are also called Kaikasa, where Vaicravana (i.e. Kubera) lives in joy with Gh. To the north of Kailasa and near the mountains of Mainaka there is the huge and beautiful mountain Hiranyacraga. Beside this the delightful lake Bindusarus (f), with golden sands. Ra. reside on Himavat, etc. (0). The two dvipas Nagadvipa and Kaçyapadvipa are the two cars of this hare-shaped region; the beautiful mountains of Malaya, having rocks like copper plates, form another part of Jambadvipa, making it resemble a hare (VI, 6). Dhrtarashtra usked Sanjaya about the regions to the north and the east side of Meru, and about the mountains of Sanjaya told about the Uttarakurus (Uttarak Kuravah) (g). East of Moru the foremost region is Bhadraços (h). The jambu tree (i). Malyavat (j) (VI, 7). Dhrtarashtra inquired about the names of all the varshas and mountains. Sanjaya related of Ramanaka, etc. (1). Dhrtarashtra became absorbed in meditation about his sons; then he said: "Time destroys and creates everything; Nara and Narayana, omniscient, destroying all creatures (sarvabhātahrt), the gods call him Vaikuntha, men call him Vishnu" (VI, 8). Dhrtarushtra asked about Bhurata-varsha (k), about which Duryodhana and the Pandavas are so covetous. Sanjaya said that the Pandavas were not covetous about it, but Duryodhana, Cakuni, etc.; then he mentioned in Bharata-varsha, the beloved land of Indra, etc. (aa), inhabited by Aryans and Mlecchas, the mountains-Mahendra, etc. (x); rivers ("all mothers of the universe and productive of great merit")-Ganga, etc. ( $\lambda$ ); countries—Kuru-Pañoālāh, etc. ( $\mu$ ); and countries in the south—Dravidah, etc. (v); the tribes of the north-Mlecchap, etc. (f); and in the east and the north-Çudrābhīrāh, etc. (o) (VI, 9). Dhrtarāshfra inquired about life, strength, etc., in Bharata-varsha, and of Haimavata-varsha and Harivarsha. Sanjaya related of the four yugas-Krta, etc.  $(\pi)$ . The portion that remains of the Dvāpara age is smull. Haimavata-varsha is superior to Bharata-varsha, and Harivarsha superior to Haimavata-varsha, in every respect (VI, 10). At last, when he and his wives were old, he got a son Jantu, whom all the wives surrounded with the utmost care. One day whon Jantu had been string by an ant at his hip and cried, Somaka, afraid of losing him, inquired of his rivij if there were a ceremony by which a man might get 100 sons. He was told to sacrifice Jantu and let his wives take a smell of the smoke of his fat; then 100 sons would be born to him, and Jantu himself would be born once more of the same mother, with a mark of gold on his back (III, 127). The sacrifice was performed notwithstanding the screams of the wives, and after ten months 100 sons were born, of whom Jantu was the eldest and most beloved and superior in merit, and had that mark of gold. When the guru and Somaka had died, the purchita was grilled in a terrible held for having performed that sacrifice, and Somaka prevailed upon Dharmardja (who said "one cannot enjoy or suffer for another person's acts") that he should be likewise tormented for the same period before he entered the blessed regions. Here they (the Pandavas, etc.) spent six nights (III, 128).

[Japakopakhyana(m)] ("the spisode about the reciter of sacred mantras"). § 6625 (Mokehadh.): A brahman, who was a reciter, conversant with the six Angas, of the Kucika race and son of Pippalada, acquired spiritual insight into the Angas; at the foot of Himwat he was devoted to the Vedas; silently reciting Gayatri, he practised austerities for 1,000 years in order to attain to Brahman. Then Gayatri (Savitri) appeared and granted him the boon that his wish for recitation should go on increasing, and his absorption into meditation (samādhi) be more complete. She added that he should not have to go to hell, thither where great brahmans go, but to the region of Brahman, and that Dharma, etc. (a), would come to him in person. He continued engaged in recitation for 1,000 celestial years. Then Dharma came to him and told him to cast off his body in order to win regions of bliss; but he did not wish to reside in heaven except with his body, but only took pleasure in recitation. Time, Mrtyu, and Yama came and told him the same. The brahman gave them arghya and padya. Ikshvaku, who had set out on a tirthayātrā, came and was given arghya and pādya. The brahman wished to give him something; Ikshvaku, as a kshatriya, would not take anything except battle, but only himself give; at last, however, he asked to be allowed to enjoy the fruits of the brahman's recitations, but when the brahman consented he would not take them, and asked the brahman what those fruits The brahman did not know, as his recitations had never been connected with any special purpose; he told the king that Truth required that he should take them as he had asked for them (the signification of Truth). Dharma and Heaven (Svargah) seconded the brahman. Ikehvaku wished to give his own merits instead, but in vaiu; then Ikshraku agreed to accept half the brahman's merit on the condition that the brahman should take half of his own. but he was refused. At this time two ungainly individuals came there, Virups and Vikrts (afterwards disclosed to be Desire and Wrath) Virapa said that he owed Vikrta the merits of the gift of a cow, but that Fikrts rofused to take repayment (in the form of the merit of having given two kapila cows with calves to an uncharrtti); Vikrta declared that Virupa owed him nothing; they asked lkshraku to decide the question. Ikshruku hesitated; the brahman threatened to curse him. Ikshuaku would give him some drops of water that had fallen upon his hand. Virapa approved of this arrangement, and said that Vikyts really did not owe him anything; "we appealed to thee for thy own sake." Bhishma said that a reciter goes to Brahmán, or Agni, or Sarya. whose attributes he catches stupefied by attachment (ragena); and so also if he goes to Soma, etc. ($); if, however, he goes to. those regions after having freed himself from attachment, he enters the Supreme and Imperishable, and becomes Brahman (XII, 199). The brahman accepted, worshipped Dharma, etc. (7), and set himself to his recitations again. Asked by Ikshvaku, he agreed that he should go half and half with the king. Indra came there with D., Lp., Sā., Vi., etc. (δ), and said to the brahman and the king that they had attained to success ([sam]siddhah). Those two withdrew their sauses from the objects of the world; fixing Prens, etc. (a), in the heart, they concentrated the mind in Prana and Apana united together, etc. (description). Brahmán welcomed the fiery flame that had issued from the head of the brahman, saying: "Reciters attain to the same end as the yogine; but as regards reciters, the honour is ordained for them that Brahmán himself shall advance to receive them"; then he once more imparted consciousness into that splendour; the brahman then entered the mouth of Brahmán, and so did the king. The deities rejoiced. Brahmán said that so also would he that reads "the great Smpti" and "the Anusmpti" (i.e. resp. "the six Angas and Manu, etc.," NIL) in this way attain to the same region with Brahmán; and so also he who is devoted to Yoga. Then Brahmán disappeared, and the deities, having honoured Dharma, returned to their respective abodes (XII, 200).

[Jarasandhavadhaparvan] ("the section relating to the killing of Jarasandha," the 23rd of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Jarasandhavadha). § 276: As Krshus thought that Jarasandha was incapable of being vanquished in battle even by all the gods and Asuras, but might be vanquished in a personal struggle with bare arms (pranayuddha, PCR.), and as there was in himself policy, in Bhims strength, and in Arjuna ability to protect them, he thought that Jarasandha should be made to challenge Bhims, and Krehns therefore obtained the permission of Yudhishthira that Bhima and Ariung followed him. They set out in the garb of englakes, with Bhims in the van, from the land of the Kurus to the Padmasaras, over Kalakuta, Gandaki, Mahacona, Sadanira (v. 794 runs thus in V.: Gendakiñes Sadanirum Carkaravartiam eva ca), the rivers on the Ekapervataka (? see BR.) and Parva (i.e. Eastern) Koçala (B. has purvame es Koçalan), Mithila, Mala, Carmanvali, Ganga, Cona, towards the east, dressed in garments of kuça-grass (instead of kuçdetracchada V. has Kuçamberahethalam), to the Magadha land. When they came to the mountain of Goraths, they beheld the Magadha town (II, 20).—§ 277: Girioraja is 355 Järäsandhi—Jaratkäru.

surrounded by the five large hills of Veikara, Varaka, Vrshabha, Rehigiri, and Caityaka. It was there that Gautama begat Kakekivat, etc., upon the cadre woman Aucineri, and was visited by the kings of Anga, Vanga, etc. There dwell the Nagas Arbuda, Cakravapin, Svaetika, and Maninaga. Manu had ordered the Magadhas never to be afflicted with drought; Kauciks and Manimat had favoured the country. The Pandavas and Krehna entered the city by breaking down the peak of Caityaka, worshipped by the Barhadrathae and the citizens with perfumes and flower garlands, where Brhadratha had slain the cannibal Rehabha, and made of his hide (māsatālābhih, see BR.; Gaudapātha: māmsanālābhih, Nil.) three drums [which the brothers broke, v. 814, not in V.]. As evil omens had been seen, the purchitas made Jarasendha mount an elephant and carried fire about him (paryagnyakurvan), and he entered upon (dikshilah) a sacrifice with vows (niyamaethah) and fasts (upavasaparah). Krehna, Bhime, and Dhananjays entered the city without weapons in the guise of endtakes, snatched from the flower-vendors the garlands they had exposed for sale, and attired in robes of various colours and decked with garlands and ear-rings they entered the abode of Jarasandha, who welcomed them, and hearing from Krehns that Bhims and Ariuns in consequence of a vow would not speak before night, quartered them in the sacrificial apartments (yajhagare) and retired to the palace (rūjagrham). At midnight he came to them, as he always observed the vow, that as soon as he should hear of the arrival of enatakes, even at midnight, he would immediately come out and grant them an audience. As he questioned them about their strange attire, which was unsuitable for endtakes, and their breaking down the Caityaka peak, and why they would not accept the worship he offered. Krehns gave him some explanations (v. 848 ff.: enātakavratino, rajan! brahmana, kehatriya, viçah viçeehaniyamaç eaisham aviçeshaç oa santy uta | viçeshavamç oa satatam kehattriyah (riyam rechati), and declared that they had come as his foes (II, 21). As Jarasandha said that he did not remember to have injured them, Krokes told him that they were sent by Yudhishthira to set at liberty the princes whom Jerasandha intended to slaughter as a sacrifice to Çiva, because sacrificing human beings to the gods was never used (v. 864); he reminded him of the destruction of Dambhodbhava, Kartavirya, Uttara, and Brhadratha, and challenged him to set free the monarchs or to fight. Jardsendhe chose to fight, and ordered Sahadeva to be installed on the throne. Then he thought of his generals Kauciks and Citrasens, who had formerly been Hames and Dimbhaks. Krekna, remembering that, according to the command of Brahman, Jardeandha was not to be slain by him or by the Madhus, did not himself desire to slay him (II, 22). Jardsandha having chosen to fight with Bhima, the purchits brought pigment, garlands, etc., and propitiatory ceremonies (krtasvastyayanak) were performed by a brahman; and likewise Bhima, having consulted with Krshaa, had propitistory ceremonies pronounced (krtasvastyayanak). When Jarosandha had taken off his grown and arranged his hair, they fought with their clenched fists as their only weapons. The combat began at the first day of the month Karttika, and lasted, without intermission or food, till the thirteenth; on the fourteenth night Jerasandha desisted from fatigue, and Kreine obscurely intimated that he should now be killed (II, 23). At the instigation of Krehns, Bhims threw Jardsandha into the air a hundred times, pressed his knee against his backbone and broke his body in two with a terrible roar, so that the citizens became dumb with terror and many women were prematurely delivered. Leaving the lifeless body at the palace gate, they went out of the town riding on Jardsandha's celestial chariot, which Krehna caused to be made ready, it being adorned with a celestial flagstaff and incapable of being vanquished by any king, upon which Indra and Vishnu had fought in the battle about Taraka, riding upon which Indra had slain ninety-nine (navatir nava) Danaras, which had been obtained by king Vasu from Vasava (i.e. Indra), from Vasu by Brhadratha, and from him by Jardsandha. And Krshna thought of Garuda, who sat upon the chariot along with the frightfully roaring creatures on its flagstaff. Krshna then released his relatives and ordered them to assist Yudhishthira at his rajasuya. Stopping on a level plain outside the town, he was adored by the citizens, and he installed Sahadeva, the son of Jardsandha, in the sovereignty of the Magadhas. Then they arrived at Indraprastha. Thereupon Krahna, having taken leave of Yudhishthira, etc., set out for his own city, riding upon that same celestial chariot that had been given to him by Yudhishthira, the Pandavas having circumambulated him (pradakshinam akurvanta) (II, 24)

Sahadeva extricated himself, and snatching the sword Kaucika, he began to call Bhimasens. Yudhishthirs reproached him, saying that the Rakshasas are the root of virtue and know virtue (dharmam) best, and that the Rūkshasas, gods, Pitrs, Siddhas, Rehis, Gandharvas, etc., depend for their lives on men, etc. Yudhishthira then made himself ponderous. Sahadeva was about to attack the Rukehasa, when Bhima appeared mace in hand. The Rakshasa set them down, and he and Bhima began to fight with trees, like Valin and Sugriva, and then with rocks, and at last by wrestling, till Bhima, having dealt a blow on the neck of the Rakshasa, lifted him up, and dashed him on the ground and severed his head from his body, and then presented himself before Yudhishthira (III, 157).

[Jatugrhaparvan] ("the section relating to the lac-house," the 8th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Jatuyeçmä-khya[m parva].) § 213: Vaiçampäyana briefly related the plan of Saubala, Duryodhana, Dukçāsana, Karņa, and Dhṛtarāshtra to burn the Pānāsasa and Kuntī in a lac-house, and their escape. Asked by Janamejaya, he then began to relate it more fully. The Pānāsasa īrustrated all the plans of murglering them laid by Duryodhana, etc., without speaking of them, in obedience to the counsels of Vidura. People began to speak in all public places of installing Yudhichthira on the throne instead of Dhriardehtra. Duryodhana represented to Dhrtarashtra that this would for ever exclude himself and his brothers from the throne (I, 141). Duryodhana, Karna, Cakuni, and Duncasana held a consultation together, and Duryodhana prevailed upon Dhrtarashtra to exile the Pandavas to Varanavata ("Acvatthaman is on my side; with him follow Drong and Krpa; Vidura is dependent on us for his means of life, though he is covertly with the foe") (I, 142). Duryodhana and his brothers begun gradually to win over the people to their side by grants of wealth and honours, while Dhytardshira suggested to the Pandavas to visit the festival of Pacupati at Varanavata. Fully understanding the motives of Dhrtarashtra, Yudhishthira let Bhishma, Vidura, Drona, Bahlika, Somadatta, Krpa, Acvatthaman, Bhuricravas, Gundhurt, etc., give thom their benedictions, and the Pandaras having performed propitiatory rites in order to obtain the kingdom, set out for Varanavata (I, 143). Duryodhana prevailed upon Purocana to reach Varanavata that very day upon a swift chariot, and to construct a house of inflammable materials and burn the Pāņdavas and Kuntī (I, 144). The people, who were distressed by the departure of the Pandaras, and angry with Dhrtardshfra, were calmed by Yudhishthira. Vidura, in obscure words (cf. Mlecchavācā, v. 5803), warned Yudhishthira, who explained the meaning to Kunti. They set out on the 8th day of the month of Phalguna when Rohini was ascendent (I, 145). They were received with great honours by the citizens of Varanavata and installed by Purocana first in a palace that had been built for them, and after ten days in the lac-house called Civa (Civakhyam). Yudhishfhira scented the smell of fat, etc., and told it to Bhims, but resolved to seem unsuspicious (I. 146). A miner, sent by Vidura, told Yudhishthira that Purocana would put fire to the house on the fourteenth night of the dark lunation, and made a large subterranean passage (I, 147). They lived there for a year. Then on a certain night Kuntl fed a large number of brahmans; and there came also a Nishada woman with her five sons, who became intoxicated and lay down in the house to sleep. The Pandavas then set fire to the house and burnt Purocana and the Nishadas, while they themselves escaped through the subterranean passage and fled in haste, Bhīma carrying his mother and brothers (cf. III, v. 546 foll.). The citizens thought they had been burnt to death (I, 148). A person sent by Vidura took the Pandavas and Kunti to the other side of the Ganga in a boat (I, 149). The miner had covered the hole he had dug with ashes, and the townspeople thought that the Nishada woman with her five sons were Kunti and the Pandavas, and sent to Dhriarashira to inform him that they had been burnt to death together with Purocana. Dhrtarachtra wept in deep sorrow, and caused the funeral rites to be performed. Meanwhile the Pandavas having proceed the Ganga proceeded in the darkness to the south and reached a dense forest. Yudhishing then prevailed upon Bhims to carry Kunti and his brothers (I, 150). The motion of Bhims's legs raised a wind like that of the months of Cuer and Cubra, while he trod down the trees and swam across streams. Towards evening they sat down in a terrible forest under a banyan-tree. Kunti was thirsty, and Bhime proceeded to a pool at a distance of a gasyati, and brought water by soaking his upper garments. When he found them alceping from fatigue, he lamented that Yudhuhfhira would not yet allow him to alay Duryodhana, etc., and sat there awake keeping watch over them (I, 151).

[Jayadrathavadhaparvan] ("the section including the slaughter of Jayadratha," the 75th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Jayadrathavadha). § 598: Dhrtarashtra lamented the slaughter of his troops; "formerly in the abode of Somadatta, who was devoted to truth, I used to hear delightful sounds" (instead of grief and lamentations, as now in the houses of Virimcati, etc. (a)); then he mentioned Krahna's ambassadorship, the match at dice, that he and Vidura, etc. (B) did not approve of; "possessed of sovereignty, the Pandavas will ever listen to the voice of Calya, etc." ( $\gamma$ ); "none can fight Bhimasena, etc. (8); only Duryodhana, etc. (6), would venture to resist them"; he asked what the principal leaders (ζ) did (VII, 85). Sanjaya rebuked Dhrtarashtra for his folly in bringing about the battle (VII, 86). Drona arrayed his divisions. The warriors shouted in anger "where is Arjuna?" etc. (1). Drona assured Jayadratha of protection by Somadatta's son, etc. ( $\theta$ ). Drona's array was in part a cakata and in part a circle, 48 miles long, and the width of its rear was 20 miles; in the rear was another impenetrable array in the form of a lotus; and within that a needle, in the mouth of the needle was Kriavarman; next came the Kamboja king, etc. (1); behind them all was Jayadratha at one side of the needle. At the head of the cakata was Drona (b). Si. and Ca. wondered. Duryodhana rejoiced (VII, 87). After the Rudra-hour (Raudre muhurte) had set in Arjuna made his appearance, while portents appeared in nature. Then Nakula's son Çatanıka and Dhrshtadyumna arrayed the divisions of the Pandavas. Durmarshana (Dhartarashtra) took up his position in the van in order to oppose Ariuna; Arjuna was at the very van of his army. Krahna and Arjuna blew their conches. The Kuru army was afraid (VII, 88).-§ 599: The fourteenth day's battle. Arjuna & Durmarshana; a terrible carnage was caused by Arjuna; Durmarshana's division fled away (VII, 89). Duhçasana & Arjuna; Duhçasana's division was slaughtered and routed; he sought protection with Drong (VII, 90). Arjung met with Drong and prayed for leave to slay Jayadratha; Drona refused leave and attacked Arjuna; unable to vanquish Drona, Arjuna avoided him from fear of losing time, and penetrated into the Kuru army, the Pañoala princes, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, boirg the protectors of his wheels; Jaya, etc. (a), opposed Arjuna, and so did the Abhishahas, etc. (A), with Drona at uneir head (VII, 91). Drona & Arjuna, who employed the Brahma weapon. Arjuna avoided Drona, began to slaughter the Bhojas, and took up his position between Krtavarman and the Kamboja king Sudakshina. Arjuna & Krtavarman, who was stupefied; Arjuna proceeded to the division of the Kambojas. Krtavarman & Yudhamanyu + Uttamaujas, who were prevented by Krtavarman from following Arjuna, who did not slay Krtavarman. Crutayudha (b) & Arjuna (+ Krshna); Crutayudha attacked Krshna with his mace, which returned and slew Crutayudha himself; all the troops fled away. The Kamboja king Sudakshina & Arjuna, who slow him; all the troops fled away (VII. 92). Arjuna slew the Abhīshāhas, etc. (7). Crutayus + Acyutayus & Arjuna, who slew them both with the Aindra weapon. Niyatayus + Dirghayus (the sons of Crutayus and Acyutayus) & Arjuna, who slew them both. The Angas (on elephants) + the Kalinga king, etc. (on elephants; urged by Duryodhana), & Arjuna, who caused a great carnage among them, as also among the Mlecchas, Yavanas, etc. (8). The Ambastha king Couldyus & Arjuna (+ hrshna), who slew him (VII, 93). Duryodhana addressed Drona in wrath and affection. Drona acknowledged his inability to oppose Arjuna on account of his own old age. Drong cased Duryodhana in invulnerable armour (invoking the Vodas, Nahusha, etc. (6)) and urged him to oppose Arjuna; with this armour he need have no fear from As., D., Y., U., Rå., men, etc. It was the armour that Civa had given to Indra, by means of which he slew Vrtra (c); Indra> Angiras > Brhaspati > Agniveçya > Drona. It was put on, its pieces being joined with Brahma strings. Brahman had himself put it on Vishnu in days of yore, and on Indra in the fight about Taraka. Duryodhana + Trigartas, etc., proceeded towards the chariot of Arjuna (VII, 94). .The Pandavas (headed by Dhrshfadyumna) + Somakas & Drona; a fierce battle ensued in front of the Kuru array; Drona & Dhrshtadyumna; Drona's host became divided into three bodies: one which retreated towards Krtararman, another towards Jalasandha, another towards Drong himself; Vivincati, etc. (ζ), & Bhimasona; king Bahlika & the Draupadeyas; the Gorasana chief Caibya & the Kaçi king; the Madra king Calya & Yudhishthira; Duhçasana & Satyaki; Sanjaya & Cekitana; Çakuni (+ 700 Gandharas) & Sahadeva; Vinda und Anuvinda & Virāţa; king Bāhlīka & Çikhandin; the Avanti chief + the Sauviras and Prabhadrakas & Dhrshladyumna; Alayudha & Ghatotkaca; Kuntibhoja and Ra. Alambusha. Jayadratha remained in the rear, protected by Krpa, etc., and the protectors of his wheels were Acratthaman on the right and Karna on the left; his rear was protected by Krpa, etc. (v), headed by Somadatta's son (VII, 95). Drona, in front of his array, fought the Parthas. Vinda and Anuvinda & Virata; Cikhandin & Bāhlīka; the Govasana king Casbya & the Kaçı king; the Bahlika king & the Draupadeyas; Duhçasana & Satyaki ; Kuntibhoja & Alambusha ; Nakula and Sahadeva & Caluni, who fled towards Drona; Ru. Ghatotkaca & Ra. Alayudha; Yudhishthira & Çalya; Vivimçati, etc. (θ), & Bhīmasena (VII, 96). Bhīmasena & Jalasandha; Yudhishthira & Krtavarman; Dhrshtadyumna & Drona; Dhrshtadyumna mounted Drona's chariot, had his pārshņi charioteers slain, etc., but was rescued by Sātyaki; Drona & Sātyaki (VII, 97). Sūtyaki (Yuyudhāna) & Drona; D. (headed by Brahmán and Soma), Si., Ca., Vd., M.-U. looked at; Drona acknowledged in Sātyaki the force of Rāma, etc. (1); D. (with Indra), G., Si., and Ca. admired him; Drona invoked the Agneya weapon, Sātyaki the Vāruņa weapon. Just at that time the sun went down in his course. Yudhishthira, etc. (x) (in order to protect Sātyaki), & Droņa (protected by Duḥçāsana, etc.) (VII, 98). Arjuna and Krshna steadily proceeded towards Jayadratha (description). Vinda and Anuvinda & Arjuna, who slew them both. While Krshna groomed Arjuna's steeds, Arjuna on foot held the whole Kuru army in check, and piercing the earth with a weapon made a lake for his steeds to drink from. and an arrow hall for them to rest within; Narada came to see the lake (VII, 99). The Si. and Ca., etc., applauded. The Kurus florcely attacked Arjuna while he was on foot; Arjuna beat back all his assailants; the Kurus applauded his prowess, blaming Duryodhana. After finishing the grooming Krshna reharnessed the steeds and proceeded with great speed. Duryodhana followed (VII, 100). The progress of Arjuna (with Krshna) became irresistible. Duryodhana outran Arjuna in a single chariot, and then turned back, facing Krshna (VII. 101). Krahna pointed out Duryodhana to Arjuna and urged him to slay him ("the three worlds with D., As., and men cannot vanquish thee, what need be said of Duryodhana?"), mentioning Duryodhana's injuries (\lambda); Arjuna promised to slay him; Arjuna & Duryodhana (VII, 102). Arjuna failed to pierce Duryodhana in consequence of the latter's invulnerable armour: "the chief of the gods gave this invulnerable armour to Angiras > Brhaspati > Indra > Arjuna." Arjuna shot strong arrows, strengthened by mantras, at Duryodhana, which were cut off by Acratthaman; this weapon could not be used again lest it should slay Arjuna himself. Arjuna deprived Duryodhana of his chariot, and steeds, and weapons; when Krshna blew Pancajanya and Arjuna drew Gandira, the Kurus [ell down on the ground. The protectors of Jayadratha attacked Krshna and Arjuna (VII, 103). Bhurigracas, etc. (4) (with Saindhava horses, etc.), & Arjuna, who blew Deradatta, as Krshņa blew Pāncajanya; Duryodhana + Bhūricravas, etc. (u), & Arjuna; Acratthaman & Arjuna (+ Krshna) (VII. 104). Sanjaya described to Dhrtarashtra the standards ( $\nu$ ). Arjuna, assailed by many chariot-warriors, slew many of them (VII, 105). In the afternoon: The Pancalas and the Pandaras (desirous of slaving Drona) & the Kurus; Brhatkshattra (among the Kaikayas) & Drona; Kshemadhurti & Brhatkshattra; Dhrshtaketu (the Cedi) & Kshemadhürti; Viradhanran & Dhrshtaketu; Yudhishthira & Drona; Vikarna (1) hartarashtra) & Nakula; Durmukha & Sahadeva; Vyāghradatta & Sātyaki; Bhūricravas & the Draupadeyas; Ra. Alambusha (Rshyaçriga's son) & Bhimasona; Yudhishthira & Drona; Yudhishthira displayed great heroism; both he and Drong invoked the Brahma weapon; Yudhishthira, in distress, getting upon the chariot of Sahadera is borne away from the field (VII, 106). Kshomadhurti & the Kaikaya prince Brhatkshattra, who slew Kshemadhurti; Viradhanvan & Dhrshfaketu (advancing against Drona); Si. and Ca. wondered; Viradhanvan was slain by Dhrshtaketu; Durmukha (Dharturashtra) & Sahadeva; Durmukha mounted the chariot of Niramitra, who was slain by Sahadeva: Nakula & Vikarna (Dhartarashtra), whom he vanquished; Vyūghradatta (Magadha prince) & Sūtyaki, who slew him; the Magadhas & Sātyaki, who nearly exterminated them; the Kurus were routed; Drona & Sūtyaki (VII, 107); Bhuricravas & the Draupadeyas; Çatanika (the son of Nakula), etc. (F), & Bhūricravas, who was slain by the son of Sahadera; Ra. Alambusha (son of Rshyacringa: recollecting the slaughter of his brother Baka) & Bhīmasena; Alambusha resorted to illusive tricks and caused a river of blood with Ra., etc., wafting away countless Cedia, etc. (a); Bhīma employed the Tvāshtra weapon; Alambusha sled to Drona (VII, 108). Ghatotkaca & Alambusha; both availed themselves of their illusive power; the Pandavas (Bhimasena, etc.) & Alambusha; Bhimasena's son, etc. (#), & do., who was slain by Ghatotkaca (VII, 109). Yuyudhana & Drona; Yudhishthira urged Dhrshtadyumna and all his troops, headed by Bhimasena, to rescue Yuyudhana; Yudhishthira (with all his troops) & Drona, who slew many and vanquished the Pandavas, etc.  $(\rho)$ ; Yudhishthira heard the sound of Pañeajanya and thought Arjuna to be in distress; he requested Satyaki to go to Arjuna and bring him news of his safety; Arjuna had said in the Draitavana to Yudhishthira, "even if Krshna, etc. (a), assist us, I shall yet appoint Sātuaki for our aid, since there is none equal to him," and Yudhishthira had witnessed his reverence for Arjuna at Draraka when returning from the tirthas, and at Upaplavya his affection for the Pandavas. "the day is about to end"; amongst the Vrshnis two were regarded as atirathas: Pradyumna and Satyaki (in weapons equal to Narayana, in strength to Sankarshana, in bravery to Arjuna, surpassing Bhishma and Drona) (VII, Satyaki hesitated to comply with Yudhishthira's request on the ground of the counter-commands of Arjuna ("only Pradyumna and Sūtyaki are a match for Drona in battle"); "the Sauvirakas, etc. (7), D., As., men, Ra., K., M.-U., etc., are no match for Arjuna in battle." Yudhishthira pressed his request, saying that Bhima, etc. (v), will protect him during Sātyaki's absence (VII, 111). Sātyaki agreed to obey Yudhishthira; "the distance from here is three yojanas"; he would crush the elephants of the Anjana breed, mounted by Mlecchas (named Rukmarathas), commanded by Karna and devoted to Duhçasana, at Karna's command returning from the pursuit of Arjuna and waiting for Satyaki, and also ordered by Duryodhana; he would also crush those 700 elephants ridden by Kirātas (sprung from the race of Agni) (o) and formerly given by the Kirāta king to Arjuna; obtaining these and Krpa, etc. (φ), Duryodhana thought lightly of the Pandavas; "also the Kumbojas (a full akshauhini) are on the alort with their eyes on me." Then Satyaki directed his chariot to be properly equipped; "I shall also have to encounter the Cakas." Yudhishthira caused quivers, etc., to be placed on Sātyaki's chariot (with steeds of the Sindhu breed); then Sātyaki set out (description) with his charioteer and friend, the younger brother of Daruka. Bhimasena also set out with Sātyaki, but was prevailed upon by Sātyaki to return and protect Yudhishthira (VII, 112). Yudhishthira followed Satyaki in order to reach the charact of Drona. Dhrehta. dyumna and king Vasudana urged the warriors to protect Sātyaki. Sātyaki made the Kurus flee away. Drona & Satyaki, who then, like Arjuna, avoided Drona, pointing out to his charioteer the Avantis, etc.  $(\chi)$ , and then smiting the great host of Karna. Krtavarman & Satyaki, who slow Krtavarman's charioteer and issued out of the Bhoja division, while Krtararman (himself urging his steeds) attacked Bhīmasena. Yuyudhāna & the Kāmbojas. Drona (making the Bhoja king protect his troops) pursued Yuyudhana, while the Pandara host began to resist him. The Pancalas (headed by Bhimasena) & Krtavarman (VII, 113). Dhrtarashtra wondered before Sanjaya that even such an army as his should be slain ("it must be Destiny"), and asked about what passed. Sanjaya, quoting Vidura, rebuked Dhrtarashtra, and then related: the Parthas (4) (headed by Bhimasena) & the Bhoja king Krtavarman; Cikhandin was brought away from the battle by his charioteer; Krtavarman vanquished all the Parthas. etc. ( $\omega$ ) (VII, 114). Sātyaki turned back to check Krtavarman, whom he deprived of his chariot; then he broke the hostile division and proceeded on his way. Satyaki & Rukmaratha (with the Trigartas and elephants, to the left of Drona's host, urged by Duryodhana they waited for Satyaki); this elephant division fled away. The Magadha king Jalasandha (on an elephant) & Yuyudhana (with white steeds), who slew him; the Kurus fled away. Drona & Yuyudhana (VII, 115). Drona, etc. (aa) & Yuyudhana; Duryodhana fled away, mounting the chariot of Citrasena. Krtavarman & Yuyudhana, who made him fall on his knees (VII, 116). Droga & Sātuaki, whose driver swooned away; Sātyaki, acting as his own driver, continued to fight with Drona, who was carried away by his steeds; the troops broke. Drong returned to the front of the array in order to check the Pandavas (VII, 117). King Sudarcana & Satyaki, who slew him (VII, 118). Satyaki's driver pronounced an eulogy (BB) upon him. Satyaki urged him to take him to the Kambojas; Yuyudhana & the Yavanas, who fled away; thousands of Kambojas, etc. (77), were similarly slain by Satyaki; Ca. and G. applauded him (VII, 119). Yuyudhana proceeded towards Arjuna; Duryodhana, etc. (δδ), followed him behind and attacked him as he proceeded slowly; an awful carnage set in; Duryodhana's chariot was taken away by the steeds; the others then fled away. Yuyudhana proceeded towards the chariot of Arjuna (VII, 120). Dhrtarashtra wondered before Sanjaya at the feats of Yuyudhana ("I think Destiny is now unpropitious"). Sanjaya blamed Dhytarashtra and Duryodhana, and then continued his narrative. At the command of Duryodhana the Samçaptakas rallying, with a number of Cakas, etc. (cc) (headed by Duryodhana), attacked Sātyaki; Duhçāsana (with a large force of robbers) & Sātyaki; many elephants of the race of Añjana, etc. (ζζ), were slain, and many steeds of the Vanayu race, etc.  $(\eta \eta)$ , and many thousands of warriors; many Daradas & Sātyaki; they fled away. Drona, hearing the noise, told his charioteer to take the chariot to the spot where Yuyudhana was; the charioteer remarked that the Pañcalas and Pandavas were rushing against Drona; suddenly Sātyaki appeared, and the broken troops and Duhcasana, all struck with panic, rushed towards Drona's division (VII. 121). Drona rebuked Duhçasana for his cowardice (quoting his words to Draupadi), and told him to make peace with the Pandaras (00). Duhçasana (with Mlecchas) & Satyaki. Drona & the Pancalas + the Pandavas, etc. (11); Drona slew the Pançala prince Viraketu, and his brothers Citraketu, Sudhanvan, Citravarman, and Citraratha; Dhrshfadyumna mounted Drona's chariot, but was then carried away by his own steeds; having caused a great carnage Drona once more took up his station in the midst of his own array (VII, 122). Duhçasana & Satyaki; the warriors of Duhçasana (but not himself) fled away. Duryodhana urged a body of 3,000 Trigartas towards Yuyudhana, who slew 500; then they turned towards Drona. While Sātyaki was proceeding towards Arjuna he was again attacked by Duhçusana, who was taken up by the Trigarta leader on his chariot; Sātyaki did not slay him, recollecting the words of Bhimasena, but quickly proceeded along the track of Arjuna (VII, 123). D. and Ca. wondered. Bhimasena, etc. (KK), & the Kauravas. Satyaki proceeded towards Arjuna. Duryodhana & the Pandavas (λλ): Duryodhana caused a great carnage. Drona (in order to rescue Duryodhana) & the Pañcalas: a dreadful carnage took place. Then there arose a loud uproar from the place where Arjuna was (VII, 124). In the afternoon: Drona & the Somakas (and Pandavas); Brhatkshattra (of the Kekayas) & Drona; both invoked the Brahma weapon; Brhatkshattra was slain by Drong, who then slew the Cedi Dhrshiaketu (the son of Çiçupāla; with steeds of the Kumboja breed), and then Dhrshtaketu's son, and the son of Jarasandha. The Cedis, etc. (μμ), & Drona, who slew them, especially the foremost among the Cedis. The Pañcalas began to tremble and loudly called for Bhimasena and Dhrshtaduumna. Drona slew Kshatradharman (Dhrshtadyumna's son), and caused Cokitans to be carried away by his steeds. Drupada (censuring Duryodhana) (placing the Parthas at his head) & Drona (then 85 years of age, with white locks, but behaving like a youth of 16) (VII, 125). Yudhishthira was anxious at not having obtained any intelligence of Arjuna and Sātyaki, and thought of sending Bhīma after Sātyaki, asking him to send him a message by uttering a leonine roar (VII. 126). Bhima requested Dhrshtadyumna to protect Yudhishthira, and prepared to set out (description) after Satuaki and Arjuna; the fierce blasts of Pancajanya were heard, filling Yudhishthira with fear. Bhīma (with his charioteer Vicoka) broke through the head of the Kuru array; the Pañodlas and Somakas followed him behind; the brothers Duhçala, etc. (vv), (with celestial weapons) he passed. and rushed against Drona's division; Drona & Bhimasena; Bhima's mace pressed Drona's chariot down into the earth; Drona, who had previously alighted, was saved; Bhima slew eleven sons of Dhrtarashtra: Kundabhedin, etc. (FF); Dhrtaräshtra's sons and the soldiers fled away. Bhīmasena then passed towards the division of Drona (VII, 127). Bhima & Drona; Bhima passing through the Bhoja, etc. (vo), division and beholding Satyaki, proceeded with great speed and sighted Arjuna, to whom he made his presence known by a roar; Arjuna and Krshna uttered loud roars in return; Yudhishthira understood that all was safe, and thought of Arjuna's feats (ππ) (VII, 128). Karna & Bhimasona; Karna mounted the chariot of Vrshasena; Bhīma uttered a loud roar that gratified Yudhishthira. Arjuna stretched Gandiva and Krshna blow Pāñcajanya (VII, 129). Duryodhana saw Drona, and affectionately chided him for his having allowed Satyaki and Bhima to penetrate the Kuru host and approach to the aid of Drona counselled Duruodhana to make effective arrangements for the protection of Jayadratha. While going back towards Jayadratha, Duryodhana encountered the two brothers, the Pancala princes, Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, the protectors of the wheels of Arjuna's chariot, who had formerly, while Arjuna penetrated the Kuru host, been checked in their progress by Krtavarman, and were now proceeding towards Arjuna by the flank of the Kuru army. Uttamaujas ascended the chariot of Yudhamanyu, which Duryodhana pressed down into the earth with his mace, and then Duryodhana ascended the chariot of the Madra king; Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas, ascending two other chariots, proceeded towards Arjuna (VII, 130). Karna proceeded against Bhima. Dhṛtarāshṭra inquired about the battle (pp). Sanjaya related: Bhīma desired to avoid Karna and to proceed towards Arjuna; Karna insultingly challenged Bhima, who turned back and encountered Karna; a fierce battle ensued between Bhima and Karna, whom Bhima deprived of his steeds and chariot. Karna mounted another chariot (VII, Continuation of the battle between Karna and Bhima, who recollected the woes in Virata's city, etc.  $(\sigma\sigma)$ . Bhīma's horses of the hue of bears and Karna's of the hue of swans mingled together; Krshna and Arjuna became anxious for Bhima; a great carnage took place (VII, 132). Dhṛtarāshṭra's eulogy on Bhīma (77); Karṇa was capable of encountering D., As., and men. Sanjaya continued: Bhima aguin deprived Karna of his steeds and driver. Duryodhana dispatched his brother Durjaya to rescue Karna; Bhima slew Duriaya; Karna wept (VII, 133). Riding upon another chariot Karna again encountered Bhima, who again deprived him of his chariot. Duryodhana dispatched his brother Durmukha to rescue Karna; Bhīma slew Durmukha, upon whose chariot Karna mounted, weeping; Karna fled, carried away by his steeds (VII, 134). Dhṛtarāshṭra's observations on Bhima's victory over Karna (vv); "I think Destiny reigns Sanjava called Dhrtarashtra "the root of this destruction of the world": then he related: five brothers of Duryodhana (φφ) + Karna & Bhīmasena, who slew the five brothers, resisting Karna the while (VII, 135). Karna became despondent of his life; Bhima again deprived Karna of his steeds, driver, and bow; Karna once more fled on foot; Duryodhana dispatched other brothers of his against Bhima, who slew them all  $(\chi\chi)$ . Karna wept, recollecting the words of Vidura; then, riding upon another chariot he encountered Bhima (description), who gladdened Arjuna, etc. ( \( \psi \psi \)) (VII, Karna sorrowfully surveyed the slain brothers of Duryodhana, and was hard pressed by Bhima, who was applauded by Ca., Bhūricravas, etc. (ww); Duryodhana dispatched seven of his brothers to the rescue of Karna; they were all slain by Bhima (acc); Bhima lamented the death of Vikarna, who was dear to him. Then he with a shout gladdened Yudhishthira, who rushed against Drona. Beholding the slaughter of thirty-one of his brothers by Bhima, Duryodhana recollected the words of Vidura (BBB) (VII, 137). Bhīma & Karņa; a great carnage was caused by both (Sindhus, Sauviras, Kauravas); Ca. and Si. were amazed (VII, 138). Continuation: D-r., Si., G., and Vd. applauded the two combatants. Pierced by Karna, Bhīma's driver sought refuge in Satyaki's chariot; Karna cut off Bhima's weapons; Bhīma leaped into the sky in order to snatch Karna off his chariot; Karna concealed himself on his vehicle; the Kurus and Ca. applauded Bhima; Bhima's weapons being exhausted he fled away from Karna and defended himself with the bodies of the elephants slain by Arjuna; but, recollecting Arjuna's vow, he did not take the life of Karna; and Karna, recollecting his promise to Kunti, did not take the life of Bhima, whom he touched with the end of his bow and insulted with his speech. Arjuna then forced Karna to fly, and speeded a terrible shaft after him when he was retreating, which was cut off by Acvatthaman, whom Arjuna then forced to flee away (VII, 139). Dhrtarashtra lamented (777). Sanjaya related: Sūtyaki followed Bhīma; Alambusha (rājavaro, v. †5828) & Satyaki, who slew him (!), and then proceeded, with his steeds of the Sindhu breed, towards Arjuna; Duhçasana and the Dhartarashtras & Satyaki, who slew the steeds of Duhçasana, gladdening Arjuna and Krshna (VII, 140). Fifty Trigarta princes & Satyaki, who made them flee away, and then, passing through the Curasenas and Kalingas. approached Arjuna, and was culogized (δδδ) by Krehna. Arjuna was not pleased with the arrival of Satyaki on account of his anxiety for Yudhishthira (cee) (VII, 141). Bhūricravas & Sātyaki; they mutually addressed (555) and challenged each other, whereafter the fight began; each deprived the other of his chariot, then they fought with swords, then with fists and hands (descriptions); Krshna urged Arjuna to protect the tired Satyaki against Bhuricravas, who was fresh; Sātyaki succumbed to Bhūrigravas; Arjuna cut off one of the arms of Bhūrigravas (VII, 142). Bhūrigravas rebuked Arjuna for his unrighteous feat (1717); Arjuna justified his conduct (000). Bhurigravas (b), abandoning Yuyudhana, desired to die in praya (description); he acknowledged the justice of Arjuna's plea, and was blessed by Arjuna and Krshna (111). Though forbidden by Krshna, etc. (KKK), Sātyaki slew Bhūrigravas sitting in prāya. The warriors did not applaud Satyaki; Si., Ca., men, and D. applauded Bhurigravas; the soldiers thought that it had been ordained by the Creator that it should be so. Satyaki justified his conduct (λλλ), quoting Valmīki (VII, 143). Dhṛtarāshṭra asked Sanjaya how Satyaki could be humiliated by Bhuricravas. Sanjaya related the history of Cini (e) and of Somadatta, and praised the Vrshni heroes, vanquishers of the very D., Da., G., As., Y., U., and Ra. (VII, 144). Arjuna proceeded to Jayadratha's chariot. Duryodhana, etc. (μμμ) & Arjuna (μμμ). Duryodhana prevailed upon Karna to protect Jayadratha (vvv); Karna promised to do his best (EEE); Duryodhana, etc. (000) (also Açvatthāman) (f) & Arjuna (+ Bhīmasena and Yuyudhāna); Si., Cā., and Pn. applauded Karna and Arjuna. Arjuna deprived Karna of his steeds, chariot, and driver. Açvatthaman made Karna ride on his chariot. Arjuna invoked the Varuna weapon; he caused a great carnage (VII, 145). Arjuna employed the Aindra weapon, etc. (description). Arjuna & Jayadratha (+ 000); Arjuna cut off Jayadratha's standard and slew his driver; Jayadratha was placed by six chariot warriors in their midst. Krshna covered the sun by means of his yoga power, so that all, except Arjuna, thought the sun to have set, and he urged Arjuna to cut off Jayadratha's head without delay; Arjuna caused such a carnage that the warriors abandoned Jayadratha in fear and fled away; Krshna again urged Arjuna to cut off Jayadratha's head without delay, telling him of Jayadratha's father Frddhakshatra (g), who was still engaged in penances outside Samantapañcaka; Arjuna should make the head fall upon the lap of Vrddhakshatra himself, lest his own head should crack in 100 pieces; this Arjuna did, and as the head fell down from Vrddhakshatra's lap the latter's head split into 100 pieces. Krshna then withdrew the darkness created by him; Krehna and Arjuna blew their conches, and Bhima, by a tremendous shout, communicated to Yudhishthira the message of victory. Yudhishthira & Drona, after the sun had set; and Arjuna fought with many mighty chariot warriors (VII, 146). Kṛpa + Açvatthāman & Arjuna; Kṛpa was carried away by his driver, and Acvatthaman fled. Arjuna, grieved at Krpa's death-like swoon  $(\pi\pi\pi)$ , Karna & Arjuna + Sātyaki + the two Pancala princes (Arjuna's wheel protectors). Krshna told Arjuna to avoid Karna because the latter had yet the lanco that Indra had given him. Karna & Sātyaki (upon Kṛshṇa's chariot with Dāruka and the horses Caibya, etc.  $(\rho\rho\rho)$ , Krshna having known before the encounter that Satyaki would be deprived of his chariot by Bhuricravas, and having therefore ordered Daruka to let his chariot be equipped the next day, and now calling Daruka by blowing his conch in the Rehabha note; neither D., G., Y., U., Ra., nor men could conquer the two Krshnas; D. with Brahman and Si. knew their prowess); Yudhamanyu and Uttamaujas (abandoning Arjuna's chariot) & Karna; such a battle had never been heard of even between D., G., As., U., or Ra.; D., G., and Dā. looked at; Sātyaki slew Karņa's charioteer and steeds. Vyshasena, etc. (σσσ), & Sātyaki. Karņa ascended the chariot of Duryodhana. Satyaki did not slay the Dhartarāshtras (Duhçāsana, etc.) on account of the vow of Bhīmassna. Açvatthaman, Krtavarman, otc., were all vanquished by Satyaki with only one bow; "in this world there are only three mighty bowmen: Krshna, Arjuna, and Satyaki," said Sanjaya. The younger brother of Daruka soon brought another chariot (description) to Sātyaki; Sātyaki ascended it, and Daruka went to Krehna. A new chariot was brought for Karna also. Sanjaya told Dhytarashtra that thirty-one of his sons had been slain by Bhimatona, etc. (777) (VII, 147). Insulted by Karna, Bhima addressed Arjuna in order to induce the latter to permit him to slay Karna; Arjuna rebuked Karna (vvv), and vowed to slay his son Vrshasena in his presence. Krshna congratulated Arjuna (φφφ), who attributed the victory to Krehna; Krehna pointed out to Arjuna the results of that day's battle; then he blew Pancajanya and went and informed Yudhishthira (VII, 148). Krshna congratulated Yudhishthira, who attributed the success to Krshna's grace  $(\chi \chi \chi)$ ; Krshna and Arjuna once more congratulated him (ψψψ); then Bhīma and Sātyaki, whom Yudhishthira congratulated (www) and embraced (VII, 149). Duryodhana's despondency (a') and cheerless address to Drona (B'), whom he censured for treating Arjuna leniently; "it seems that Karna only now wishes us victory" (VII, 150). Drona's reply to Duryodhana  $(\gamma')$ ; he vowed to slay all the Pañcalas before doffing his armour; he asked Duryodhana to tell Acvatthaman to avenge himself on the Somakas, etc., even at the risk of his life. Then he proceeded against the Pandavas Duryodhana communicated to Karna his (VII, 151). suspicions about Drona's sincerity (ô'); Karna removed Duryodhana's suspicions of Drona (e'), and attributed the ill-success of the Aurus to destiny. Meanwhile the Pandava divisions appeared for battle, and a fierce battle ensued (VII, 152).

Jayadrathavimokshana(m) ("the setting free of Jayadratha"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 325 (i.e. Jayadrathavimokshanaparvan).

[Jayadrathavimokshanaparvan] ("the setting free of Jayadratha," the 47th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Jayadrathavimokshana.) § 523 (cf. Draupadibar.): Bhīma seized Jayadratha by the hair, and holding him high up in the air thrust him on the ground, etc., and regretted that Yudhishthira had forbidden to kill him. He then with his arrow shaved Jayadratha's head, leaving only five tufts of hair, and made him promise to say in public assemblies, "I am the slave of the Pandavas." They then bound him and thrust him into the chariot; then they drove towards the hermitage and presented him to Yudhishthira. Yudhishthira and Draupadi set him free with his army. § 524 : Jayadratha went to Gangadvara, and pleased Civa so that he deigned to accept his offerings in person and granted him a boon. Jayadratha asked that he might be able to defeat in buttle all the five Pandavas on their chariots. This Civa declared to be impossible, as Arjuna (b) was invincible, and was protected by Krshna, who was Vishnu (c). Civa then briefly reminded Javadratha of four incarnations of Vishnu (d). "Thou shalt, however, be able to vanquish for a single day only the rest of Yudhishthira's forces and the four Pandavas, but not Arjuna." Then Civa vanished with Uma, Jayadratha returned home, and the Pandavas continued to dwell in Kāmyaka (III, 272).

There Cira used to sit with Parvati, waited upon by D., V., etc. (a). After some time the Prajapati Daksha commenced to perform a sacrifice, whither all the gods headed by Indra, with the permission of Civa, repaired mounted on their chariots, proceeding to that spot whence the Ganaā is said to issue. Pārvatī asked why Civa did not himself proceed thither, and was told that in days of yore the deities made an arrangement in consequence of which no share was assigned to Civa of offerings in sacrifices. He was filled with grief. Cipa ordered Nandin to wait there, and summoring all his yoga force, he, with all his terrible followers, came and destroyed that sacrifice (description); it assumed the form of a deer and tried to fly away through the skies, pursued by Civa with bow and arrow. A drop of sweat fell from his forehead down on the earth; there appeared a terrible fire, whence issued a dreadful being of very short stature, etc. (description), who consumed the embodied form of sacrifice and then attacked D. and R., who fled in all directions. The earth began to tremble, etc. Brahmán appeased Civa by promising him a share of the sacrificial offerings; the being that had sprung from his sweat should be distributed among all creatures as fever (description of the distribution). Kaca, a brahman, the son of Brhaspati. § 145 (Sambhavap.):

Janamejaya suid: How did Yayāti get Devayānī? Vaiçampāyana related: In the many battles between the gods and the Asuras, the gods had for their purchita Brhaspati Āngirasa, and the Asuras Uçanas Kāvya (i.e. Çukra). As Uçanas, by his science Sañjīvinī, restored the fallen Dānavas to life, and Brhaspati was unable to revive the fallen gods, the gods prevailed upon Brhaspati's son Kaca to repair to Uçanas and conciliate him and his daughter Devayānī and learn the Sañjīvinī. K. then repaired to the capital of Vrshaparcan, the king of the Dānavas, and promising to practise brahmacarya for 1,000 years he was accepted by Uçanas as his pupil. Young as he was he, by singing and dancing and playing on instruments, etc., soon gratified Devayani. After 500 years the Danavas, having discovered who he was, slew him, and one time hacked his body to pieces and gave it to wolves and jackals, another time they pounded it into paste and mixed it with the waters of the ocean, but both times Devayant prevailed upon Uçanas to restore K. to life by the Sanjivini, summoning him and saying, "Come." Then slaying him for the third time they burned the body and mixed the ashes with the wine (surā) which Uçanas drank. As Devayānī again asked her father to revive K.. Uçanas said: "It is of no use, as he is always killed again; thou art always worshipped by the Brahman (i.e. the Veda, Nil.), the brahmans, the gods including Indra, the Vasus, the Acrins, the enemies of the gods and the whole world, therefore do not grieve for a mortal." As Devayani said she would starve. Cukra imparted the Sanitvini to K., who, though reduced to powder, remembered everything. K. then came out, ripping open the stomach of Cukra and then revived Cukra by the Sanjivini. Uçanas declared that henceforth that brahman who would drink wine should be reckoned to have committed the sin of slaying a brahman. K. stayed with Cukra for 1,000 years (I, 76). When K. was about to return to the gods Devayani asked him to become her husband, and as he refused (saying that she was a sister to him) she cursed him, saying that his science should bear no fruit. K. again cursed Derayani, saying that no rshi's son should take her hand, and that his science should bear fruit, if not to himself, at least to him to whom he might impart it. Then he went to the abode of Indra, and the gods declared that he should become a sharer with them in sacrificial offerings (I, 77): I, 76. 3199 (jyeshtham putram Brhaspateh), 3199 (Brhaspatisutah), 3201 (reher Angirasah pautram putram sakshad Brhaspateh), 3203, 3204, 3209, 3212, 3213, 3214, 3215, 3216, 3219 (Brhaspatisutah), 3223, 3226, 3227, 3228 (Brhaspatch sutah), †3232, (†3237), †3239, †3240, †3241, †3244, †3245, †3248, †3253, 3255; 77, (3261), 3265, (3267), 3271, (8272), 3276, 3277.—§ 146 (Devayānī): I, 78, 3279; 80, 3335 (Angirasam, all. to § 145).-§ 637 (Rajadh.): XII, 477, 1596 (among the rshis who surrounded Bhishma.)- § 734 (Anuçasanik.): XIII, 26a, 1765 (do.). Kairātaparvan ("the section treating of the Kirāta"), the 33rd of the minor parvane of Mhbhr., forming an episode to Arjuna's journey to the abode of Indra (cf. Kairūta). § 331. It is anew related how Arjuna set out from the Kamuaka wood towards the north; he entered a terrible forest (description), resorted to by Siddhas and Caranas, and then proceeded to the Himavat (description). For four months he practised austerities (specified), until the rshis made representations about it to Civa, who dismissed them after having removed their fears (III, 38). Then Civa with his bow and arrows, in the guise of a Kirāta, accompanied by Umā in the guise of a Kirāta woman, by merry spirits (bhūtaih), and thousands of women, approached Arjuna as he was about to kill Mūka, a son of Danu, who in the form of a boar would have killed Arjuna. Arjuna and Civa at the same time pierced Maka with their arrows, and killed him; when dying he again assumed his rakshasa form; then they fought against each other, first with arrows, then with the very bows, then with swords, then with trees and stones, then with the fists, and then by clasping each other; at last Arjuna lost his senses, and was almost reduced to a ball of flesh; when he regained consciousness he made a clay image of Cira, which he worshipped with a garland, which then appeared on the head of the Kirāta; he thus learned that it was Civa, and prostrated himself at his feet. Civa declared that Arjuna's prowess was equal to his own, promised to give him his weapon, and gave him 'eye' (cakshus), so that he behold him in his true form, together with Uma. - § 332: Arjuna then fell on his knees and worshipped him, saying: "O Kapardin! etc." (v. Mahadevastava) (III, 39).- § 333: Civa said that Arjuna (b) was in a former life Nara, etc. When granted a boon, Arjuna asked Civa to give him the Paçupata weapon named Brahmaçiras (c). Having purified himself he was instructed in its use on the condition that he should not hurl it against a human being, for then it would destroy the universe. The earth trembled, etc. The gods and Danavas beheld the weapon in its bodily shape standing by the side of Arjuna. When Arjuna had been touched by Civa, all that was evil in his body was dispelled. Having said to Arjuna, "Go thou into heaven," Civa went up into the skies accompanied by Umā (III, 40).- § 334: Then Arjuna was on the Himavat visited by the Lokapalas, viz., Varuna (blue as lapis lazuli), together with rivers, Nagas, Daityas, and Sadhyas; Kubera, who dwells on Kailasa, golden-coloured (jambanadavapuh), accompanied by Yakshas; Yama, with staff in hand (dandapanih), illuminating the three worlds, and the Guhyakas, Gandharvas, and Nagūs, accompanied by those lords of the creation (lokabhāvanaih) the Pitrs; further Cakra, with Mahendrani, mounted on the neck of Airavata, and surrounded by the gods, and eulogized by Gandharvas and rehis. Each of them occupied a particular summit of Himavat (Yama to the south, Varuna to the west). They granted him 'sight' (archie), that he might see them. Yama said that Arjuna would defeat the Nivatakavacas, etc., and gave him his irresistible staff (danda) as a weapon. Varuna (b) gave him his irresistible nooses. Kubera said that in bygone kalpas Arjuna had always gone through ascetic austerities along with them, and gave him his favourite weapon Antardhana (o). Indra said he would descend to earth in his chariot with Malali as his charioteer, and taking him to heaven grant him all his celestial weapons (III, 41).

Kalmāshapāda, Saudāsa (also named Mitrasaha), king of Ayodhyā and husband of Madayantī. § 188 (Madayantī):

I, 122, 4737 (being himself unable to beget children K. urged Madayanti to go to Vasishtha, who begat Açmaka on her, cf. § 225). — § 224 (Vāsishtha): The rājarshi of the race of Ikshvāku Kalmāshapāda (whose sacrifices Viçvāmitra had desired to perform) once when hunting met the viprarshi Caktri, the cldest of Vasishtha's 100 sons, and ordered him to stand out of his way, and as Caktri did not yield K. struck him with his whip. Caktri then cursed him, saying: "From this day thou shalt be a rakshasa, cating human flesh." The king began humbly to propitiate the rshi, but Viccamitra (between whom and Vasishtha there was a dispute about K., whom they both wanted as their yajya) passed before them without being seen, and caused a rakshasa named Kinkara to enter the king. Vicvāmitra then went away. At this time a hungry brahman beheld in the wood K., who was terribly afflicted by the rakshasa, and asked the king for some food with meat. K. asked him to stay there for a moment, and having roved for some time at pleasure at last entered his inner apartments. When waking at midnight and remembering his promise, he summoned his cook, and as the cook did not find any meat K. said: "Feed him with human flesh." The cook then took human flesh from the place where the executioners were, and offered it to the hungry brahman. Seeing with his spiritual power of vision (siddha-cakshusha) what kind of food it was, the brahman in anger said that the king himself should take a fancy to such food and wander over all the earth alarming all creatures. The curse on the king, being thus repeated a second time, became very strong, and possessed by the rakshasa the king lost all his senses. A while after K., beholding Caktri, in order to revenge himself for the curse slew him and ate him up. And Vicramitra caused that rakshasa also to devour the other sons of Vasishtha: I, 176, 6696 (Ikshvakuvamçajah), [6720 (Mitrasahah B., C. has mitrasaham as adj. to dvijam)] .- § 225 (Väsishtha): I, 177. 6761, 6768 (Vasishtha delivered K. from the curse of Caktri, and then at the request of K. begat Acmaka on Madayanti, the queen of K.).- § 228 (Aurvop.): 1, 181, 6881 (attained to heaven). - § 229 (Vasishthop.): I, 182, 6888, 6904 (rajarshim, it is related why K. caused Vasishtha to beget a son on his wife).-[§ 480 (Pativratop., Brahmanavyadhasamv.): 111, 208, 13817 (Saudāsena, all. to § 224).]— § 607 (Karnap.): VIII, 45, 2092 (Rakshasah, a sentence of his is quoted; read with B. Kāmyaka 2, a luke. § 295 (Dyūtap.): II, 52, 1877 (sarah). [Kāmyakavanapraveça(h)] ("proceeding to the Kāmyaka-wood," cf. Arjunabhigamanap.). § 328: As Yudhishthira declared that Bhūrigravas, Çala, Jalasandha, etc., and Karņa (master of all weapons, etc.), and the Dhartarashtras, together with the kings who had been injured by the Pandavas, could not now be vanquished, that all the Kaurava soldiers and their families had been honoured with wealth and luxuries by Duryodhana, and would sacrifice their lives for him, and that, although Bhishma, Drona, and Krpa, all knowing celestial weapons and being invincible, behaved equally towards both parties, they would certainly, to pay off the royal favours they enjoyed, lay down their very lives in battle, Bhima remained silent.—§ 329: While they were conversing thus Vyāsa appeared, and, taking Yudhishthira into a corner, taught him, after he had purified himself (quddhaye), the science of Pratismyti, by means of which Arjuna (b) should proceed to Mahendra, Rudra, Varuna, Kubera, and Yama, to receive weapons from them. He also advised him to go to some other forest in order not to cause uneasiness to the ascetics and exterminate the deer and destroy the plants. Then Vydsa disappeared. The Pandavas went to the forest of Kamyaka on the banks of the Sarasvatī, followed by numerous brahmans versed in cikshā and akshara (see § 322), and lived there devoted to the Dhanurveda, and sacrificing to the Pitrs, the gods, and the brahmans (III, 36).

[Kapota-lubdhaka-samvāda(h)] ("the conversation between the dove and the fowler"). § 651b (Apaddh.): Bhargava related: A cruel fowler (description) was surprised in the forest by a great storm (description); the paths of the forest were all submerged; he caught a she-pigeon and immured her in a cage; when the sky cleared he passed the night under a tree, having bowed down to the deities that had this tree for their resort (XII, 143). In one of the branches of that tree the male pigeon lamented the loss of his wife (XII, 144). The she-pigeon answered him from within the hunter's cage, telling him to do the duties of hospitality to the fowler (XII, 145). The male pigeon welcomed the fowler, who was stiff with cold, by igniting a fire; as the fowler was hungry, the pigeon (quoting R., D., and P.) himself entered the fire, at which the fowler became terrified, thinking of his own cruel life (XII, 146), expressed his repentance, and set at liberty the she-pigeon, etc. (XII, 147). The she-pigeon lamented for the death of her spouse; then she threw herself into the blazing fire; the couple of pigeons ascended to heaven (XII, 148). The fowler took to rigid penances, perished in a forest conflagration, and beheld himself in heaven in splendour like Indra among Y. and G. and Si. (XII, 149).

He grew very strong and soon mastered the vedangas; there was nothing he would not give to the brahmans. In order to benefit Arjuna, Indra in the guise of a bruhman obtained his ear-rings and armour, and in return gave him a lance with which he could slay any one amongst gods, Asuras, men, Gandharvas, and Rākshasas. Because he took off (utkrtya) his natural armour and ear-rings he was called Vaikartana Karna. He was the friend and counsellor of Duryodhana: 1, 66, [2776 (Vasusheneti . . . vicrutam), 2780, 2782 (Vaikartanah), 2783.- § 175 (Karnasambhava): I, 111, 4399, 4408, 4411 (Vaikartanah; repetition of § 131).-§ 197 (Bhīmasena-rasapāna): I, 129, 5068.-[§ 203 (Drona): I, 132, 5221 (Sataputrac ca Radheyah. became the disciple of Dropa in the Dhanurveda). ]- § 2080 (Astradarcana): When the exhibition had nearly ended there was heard proceeding from the gate the slapping of arms like to the roar of thunder. Then K. (the son of Prtha and the Sun) proceeded with his natural mail and ear-ring and bowed to Drong and Krps. Having spoken disdainfully to Ariung. at which Duryodhana was filled with delight, he then, with the permission of Drona, did all that Arjuna had done before. Duryodhana and his brothers in joy embraced K. K. asked for a single combat with Arjuna, who rebuked him. Drong gave his consent to the encounter. Indra covered Arjuna with clouds, while the Sun dispersed the clouds from K., who remained visible, surrounded by the rays of the Sun. When Krps asked K. to tell his lineage ("sons of kings never fight with men of inferior lineage, v. 5411) K. was ashamed, but Duryodhana (saying, "The origin of kings is, according to the castras, threefold-persons of noble blood, heroes, and those who lead an army," v. 5413) immediately installed K. king of the Angas (I, 136). Then Adhiratha entered the lists and embraced K. as his son Bhimasena, seeing this, scoffed at K. as the son of a charioteer (sūla), but was reprimended by Duryodhana ("the origin, of heroes and rivers is always unknown," examples: the fire that rises from the water; the thunderbolt (vajra) that was made from the bones of Dadhīca; Guha, i.e. Skanda, is named the son of Agni or of the Krttikah or of Rudra or of Ganga; Victamitra and other kshatriyas who became brahmans; Drona and Krpa). When the sun went down Duryodhana led K. out of the arena. Kunti had recognized K. as her son and was pleased at his success. Kundalāharanap.): Asked by Janamejaya, Vaiçampāyana related the secret which was not revealed to K. by Surya. Prtha (i.e. Kunti), the sister of Vasudeva and the daughter of the Vrehni Cara and adopted by King Kuntibhoja, was ordered by Kuntibhoja to wait upon a brahman of fierce energy (III, 303, 304). After a year the brahman gave her a mantra (Atharvaçirasi crutam), by which she might invoke the gods (III, 305). When she at the time of her seasons saw the sun's orbit she became possessed of celestial power of vision, and beheld Surya with his coat of mail and his ear-rings and invoked him. By way of yoga he divided himself into two, one of whom appeared before Kunii. At first Kunii was frightened (III, 306), but Surys reassured her, saying: "Thou shalt remain a virgin after having gratified mc, and thy son shall have the ear-rings and the coat of mail, made of amrta, that have been given to me by Aditi," etc.; then he entered her by virtue of yoga (III, 307). This happened in the bright fortnight of the tenth month (cukle dacottare pakehe). Except her nurse nobody else knew about the matter: when the child was born she consulted with her nurse and placed it in a box on the river Acvanadi, imploring protection from Varuna, Surya, A., V., R., S., V.-D., M., diçah, digiçvarah, I., etc.; from Açvanadi the basket floated to the river Carmanvati, thence to the Yamuna, and so on to the Ganga, to the town of Campa, in the country of the Angas (III, 308), ruled by the suta Adhiratha (the husband of Radha), who was childless. They adopted the child and called him Vasushena and Vreha (only afterwards he was named K.). After having adopted K., Adhiratha had other sons begotten by himself. When K. had grown up he was sent to Hustinapura, and acquired the four kinds of weapons from Drona, Krpa, and Rama, and became the friend of Duryodhana, but was intent on injuring the Pandavas, especially Arjuna. Yudhishthira was afraid of him. When K. after rising from the water at noon worshipped Sarya, brahmans used to solicit him for wealth, and there was nothing that he would not give away to the brahmans (III, 309). Indra in the guise of a brahman appeared before him, asked him for his coat of mail, and gave him, instead a dart ( Vasavi), which could not be buffled and which, in the hands of Indra, destroyed the Dailyas and then returned to him. "This dart can only slay one powerful enemy of thine and then it will return to me, but it will not be that one which thou seekest to slay, for he is protected by Krshna." K. cut the coat of mail and ear-rings off his person, Indra having granted him that his body thus disfigured should not become unsightly. Gods and men and Danavas raised a loonine roar. For this feat he was called Karna. The Dhartarashtras became distressed and the Pandavas were filled with joy. [Karna-digvijaya(h)] ("subjection of the earth by Karna"). § 515 (Ghoshay.). When Duryodhana had come to Hastinapura, Bhishma said to him that, as he had told him before, this journey did not please him, and advised him to make peace with the Pandavas. Duryodhana laughed and sallied out with Cakuni, followed by Karna and Duhçasana. When Bhishma, ashamed, had gone away, they returned and began to consult. Karna complained of the partiality of Bhishma for the Pandavas, and promised to conquer the world for Duryodhana. Duryodhana gladly accepted his offer, and on an auspicious lunar day, etc., Karna set out (III, 253). Karna, surrounded by a large army, first made Drupada and the princes that were under him pay tribute. He then successively conquered the north (Bhagadatta, the kings inhabiting the Himavat), the cust (the Angas, Vangas, Kalingas, Mandikas (B. Cundika), Mithilas, Magadhas, Karkakhandas, Avaçiras, Yodhyas, Ahikshattra, Vatsabhumi, Kevali, Mrttikūvati, Mohana, Pattana, Tripurā, Koçalā), the south (Rukmin, the Pandya mountain, Keralu, Nila, the son of Venudari, Caicupala, the Avantyas, the Vrshnis, etc.), and the west (Yaranas, Barbaras, etc.), with the Mlecchas, the mountaineers, Bhadras, Rohitakas, Agneyas, Malavas, Caçakas, Nagnajit, etc. Having returned to Hastinapura, he was highly praised by Duryodhana and Dhrtarashtra, who sat with Gandhari (III, 254).

Karnaparvan ("the section relating to Karna," the 8th of the greater and the 79th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). § 4 (Anukram.): I, 1, 90 ("sitaih pushpaih).—§ 10 (Parvas.): I, 2, 346.—§ 11 (do.): I, 2, 542, 549.—§ 604: The night after Drona's death, and the sixteenth morning, and brief account of the sixteenth and seventeenth days. After Drona's death the Kuru warriors in grief, with Duryodhana at their head, repaired to Accatthaman. When night came (!) they proceeded to their tents, but could not sleep (a); they (a) passed that night together in Duryodhana's tent, reflecting (β). When morning came they rose and performed their customary rites. Arranging their troops they proceeded to battle, making Karna their leader. The Pandavas also proceeded to battle. Karna fought for two days and was then slain by Arjuna. Sanjaya repaired to Hastinapura and informed Dhrtarashtra of Karna's fall. Janamejaya inquired about Dhytarashira and the details of the battle (VIII, 1). Vaiçampüyana said: After the fall of Kurna, Sanjaya set out that night for Hüstinapura and spoke with Dhytarushtra (7) (VIII, 2). Sanjuya related the discouragement of the Kuru army after the fall of Drona: Duryodhana's spirited address; Karna was made generalissimo but slain by Arjuna on the second day ( $\delta$ ) (VIII, 3). Hearing of Karna's fall in battle, Dhrtarashtra swooned away; he and the ladies were restored to their senses; Dhrtardshtra inquired whether Duryodhana was still alive; Sanjaya informed him of Duhçasana's slaughter (e) (VIII, 4). Requested by Dhrtarashtra. Sanjava recounted the names of those that had fallen and those that were still alive; Dhrtarashtra once more swooned away (5) (VIII, 5-7). Dhṛtarāshṭra's lamont for Karņa (1) (VIII, 8); Sanjaya endeavoured to comfort him; continuation of Dhytarashtra's lament (0) (VIII, 9) .- \$ 605. THE SIXTEENTH DAY: After Drona's fall the Kruravas, having fled and been rallied by Duryodhana, fought for a long time with the Pandavas (Arjuna). On the approach of the evening twilight (!) the Kauravas retired to their encampment; they held a consultation in the night; Duryodhana inquired of his counsellors as to what should next be done. Accatthaman suggested the installation of Karna as generalissimo (1). Duryodhana offered Karna the command, which Karna accepted, promising to slay the Pandaras (a). Karna was installed in the command and blessed by the brahmans, and ordered the troops to be arrayed at the rise of the sun  $(\lambda)$ (VIII, 10). Beholding Karna, none recked the loss of Bhishma or Drong, etc. He formed a makara array: the tip  $(\mu)$ , the two eyes  $(\nu)$ , the head  $(\xi)$ , the neck (a), the middle  $(\pi)$ , the left foot  $(\rho)$ , the right foot  $(\sigma)$ , the left hind-foot (7), the right hind-foot (v), the tail ( $\phi$ ). Yudhishthira asked Arjuna to array the Pandara army and slay Karna ("incapable of being vanquished by . . . D., As., G., K., and M.-U."). The Pandara troops were arrayed in the shape of the half-moon; the left side  $(\chi)$ , the right side  $(\psi)$ , the middle (w), the rear (aa); Yudhāranyu and Uttamaujas became the protectors of Arjuna's chariot wheels, and did not quit him for a moment. Then commenced the battle (VIII, 11). A fierce slaughter on both sides (description). Dhrehtadyumna, etc. (BB), headed by Bhimasona & Kshomadhurti (Kulutudhipatih), who was slain by Bhimasena. The Kurus fled away (VIII. 12). Nakula & Karna; Bhimasena & Acvatthaman; Salyaki & the Kaikaya princes (brothers) Vinda and Anuvinda; King Citrasena & Crutakarman; Prativindhya & Citra; Duryodhana & Yudhishthira; Arjuna & the Samçaplakas; Dhrehtadyumna & Krpa; Çikhandin & Krtavarman; Çrutakīrti & Çalya; Sahadeva & Duhçāsana. Anuvinda was slain by Satyaki, and so was Vinda; Satyaki got upon the chariot of Yudhamanyu, then upon another chariot; the Kaikeyas fled (VIII, 13). Crutakurman & the Abhisara king Citrasena, whom he slew and then he pursued his flying troops. Prativindhya & Citra, whom he slew. The Kurus fled; only Acvatthaman & Bhimasena (VIII, 14); Si., Ca., D., and M.-r. applauded them; both were borne away insensible by their drivers (VIII, 16). Arjuna & the Samçaptakas; Si., D.-r., and Ca. applauded him, etc. Acrathaman & Arjuna (+ Krehna), who fought

also the Samcaptakas (VIII, 16); the Kalinga, Vange, and Nishada heroes attacked Arjuna with a division of elephants, which was broken; Krehna urged Arjuna not to spare Acvatthaman, who at last was borne away by his steeds and entered the army of Karna; Krehna and Arjuna proceeded towards the Samçaptakas (VIII, 17). The Magadha chief (lord of Girivraja) Dandadhara massacred the Pandava army. Ariung (urged by Krshna) & Dandadhara (on an elephant), whom he slew; his brother Dands & Arjuna (+ Krshna), who slew him; the hostile force broke up; Arjuna proceeded once more against the Samçaptakas (VIII, 18), whom he slaughtered; Ugrāyudha's son & Arjuna, who slew him; urged by Krshna, Arjuna smote the remnant of the Samçaptakas, hastening in order to kill Karna; Krehna described the dismal sights of the field of battle "for the sake of Duryodhana alone". The army of Duryodhana was defeated by Pandya (VIII, 19), who regarded himself as superior to Bhishma, etc.  $(\gamma\gamma)$ , and was slaughtering the army of Karna, the Pulindas, etc. (δδ); Acvathaman & Pandya (b), who employed the Vayavya weapon; meanwhile Karna began to rout the elephant force of the Pandavas; Pandys ascended a riderless elephant and split Acvathaman's diadem; then Açvatthāman slew him, who had given numerous steeds, men, and elephants as food to the Ra. Duryodhana and his brothers worshipped Karna (VIII, 20). Krshna said to Arjuna that he did not see Yudhishthira; the Pandavas had retreated, and Karna was slaying the Srnjayas. The Kurus (headed by Karna) & the Pandavas (headed by Bhimasona); Karna caused a great carnage among the Pandavas, Srajayas, and Pancalas. The Pancala chief, etc. (ee). & Karna (VIII, 21); Dhrshtadyumna & the Angas, etc. (55); the Pandavas and the Pañcalas come to the aid of Dhrshtadyumna: Nakula. etc.  $(\eta\eta)$ , overloaded the elephants with their weapons; Salyaki killed the elephant of the Vanga king and felled the rider; Sahadeva & Pundra, whose elephant he slew, and then proceeded towards the Anga chief; Nakula & the Anga king (Mleccha king), whom he slew; the elephant-men of the Angas + Mekalas, etc. (00), & Nakula; then the Pandavas, etc. (11), rushed to the rescue of Nakula; Sahadeva slew eight elephants and Nakulu many; Dhrehfadyumna, etc. (xx), overloaded the elephants with arrows; the hostile army fled away and the Pandava warriors rushed against Karna (VIII, 22). Sahadeva & Duḥçāsana, who was taken away by his charioteer; Sahadera crushed Duryodhana's division (VIII, 23). Karna & Nakula; both the Somakas and Kurus were greatly afflicted; Nakula fled on foot; Karna pursued him and placed his stringed bow around his neck, but let him escape, recollecting the words of Kunti; Nakula in great shame proceeded towards Yudhishthira's churiot, which he ascended. Karna at noon made a great slaughter among the Pançalas and the Srnjayas, and pursued them (VIII, 24). Uluka & Yuyutsu, who was vanquished and mounted another chariot. Uluka slaughtered the Pañcalas and the Srnjayas. Crutakarman (Dhartarashtra) & Çatanıka; both were deprived of their chariots and retired; Crutakarman mounted the chariot of Vivinça, Catanika that of Prativindhya. Cakuni & Sulasoma, who was deprived of his chariot, but contended on foot with Cakuni, who fought from his chariot; the Si., etc., were highly pleased; Sulasoma went to the chariot of Crutakirti; Cakuni slew many of the Pandava army (VIII, 25). Krpa & Dhrehtadyumna, who got bewildered and let his charioteer carry him to Bhimasena, pursued by Krpa. Krtavarman (the Bhoja king) & Çikhandin, who fell into a swoon, and was borne away by his charioteer; the Pandava army fled (VIII, 26). Arjuna & the Trigartas, etc. (λλ); Arjuna slew king Çatruñjaya, and Sucruta's son, and Candradeva; King Satyasena wounded Ryshaa and was slain by Arjuna, who then slew Citravarman and the Samcaptakas in hundreds and thousands, and Mitrasena, and wounded Suçarman; all the Samçaptakas attacked Arjuna, who invoked the Aindra weapon (description); the hostile army fled away almost entirely (VIII; 27). Duryodhana & Yudhishthira, who deprived him of his chariot; Karna, etc.  $(\mu\mu)$ , rushed to his aid; the other sons of Pandu surrounded Yudhishthira; the Pañcalas & the Kauravas (description); Karna slaughtered the Pancellas, Arjuna the Trigartas, Bhimasena the Kurus and their elephant division, when the sun had passed the meridian (VIII, 28); Duryodhana (on another chariot) & Yudhishthira; Duryodhana swooned away; Bhimasena prevented Yudhishthira from slaying Duryodhana: Krtararman & Bhimasena in the afternoon (VIII, 29). The Kurus (placing Karna at their van) & the Pandava army (and Satyaki); Karna & Satyaki; many Kurus came to rescue Karna, but fled away before the Pandavas, who were headed by the sons of Drupada; Arjuna and Krshas (having said their duily prayers and worshipped Bhava) destroyed the Kurus; Duryodhana & Arjuna; Arjuna & Açvalthaman + Krpa, etc. (vv); Satyaki, etc. (FF), & Karna, who vanquished them; Arjuna & Karna; many Kurus fled away. At the close of the day both armies withdrew; Ra. and Pc., etc., appeared (VIII, 30). Dhrtarashtra exalted the prowess of Arjuna (oo). The Kurus, in grief, took counsel of one another; Karna assured Duryodhana that he would slay Arjuna on the morrow. On the morrow they beheld an invincible array formed by Yudhishthira according to the rules of Brhaspati and Ucanas. Duryodhana and his troops put confidence in Karna. Dhrtarāshtra's grief (ππ); Sanjaya rebuked him by reminding him of his evil acts  $(\rho\rho)$ . At dawn Karna repeated before Duryodhana his pledge to slaughter Arjuna; "my bow Vijaya (c) is the foremost of all weapons; . . . Arjuna is superior to me only by having Krshna ('the Creator of the Universe') for his charioteer, the chariot given him by Agni, his steed, and his standard with the Ape." He desired to have Calya ("who is superior to Krehna") to drive his chariot; Duryodhana solicited Calya (VIII, 31) to comply with Karna's wishes (σσ); Calya took offence at the proposal (77); Duryodhana repeated his request in honorific words (vv), and Calya accepted on the condition that he might, in Karna's presence, utter whatever he desired  $(\phi\phi)$  (VIII, 32). § 606: Duryodhana related to Calya Tripurākhyāna (q.v.), which the great R. Markandeya had narrated to his father. "As Brahmán, . . . the Supreme Deity acted as the driver of Rudra, so do thou restrain the steeds of Karna" (VIII, 33). He then related a story of Paraçu-Rāma (b), which a virtuous brahman had recited in the presence of his father. Rama gave the Dhanurveda to Karna, "whom I do not think to have been born in the Sata order, but to be the son of a god, born in the Kehatriya order and abandoned in infancy" (VIII, 34). Duryodhana said: "So did Brahman act as Rudra's driver; the driver should be superior to the warrior; thou art selected by us as superior to Karna." Calya said that many a time he had heard this history recited to him, and Krshna, knowing the same, had become the charioteer of Arjuna, and would fight if Arjuna were slain. Duryodhana eulogized Karna (a) and then Calya (etymology) as superior to Krehna. repeated his promise and condition. Duryodhana embraced

Karna, and, requested by him, once more obtained the promise of Calya, who embraced Duryodhana and asked their forgiveness for the words he might speak to Karna for his good: "what I shall say, in order to inspire thee confidence, is fraught with self-adulation; I am a driver like Matali himself" (VIII, 35). - § 607: Duryodhana said to Karna: "Calya, who is superior to Krahna, will act as a driver, like Matali to Indra." When the morning came, Duryodhana again successfully asked Calya to become Karna's charioteer. Karna having worshipped the chariot (which had in days of old been sanctified by a priest). they both ascended it. Duryodhana once more addressed Karna (a). Karna told Calya to urgo the steeds that he might slay Arjuna, etc. (B); Calya endeavoured to inspire Karna with fear by eulogizing the Pandavas (VIII, 36). When Karna set out there appeared ill omens. The Kuru army, however, was filled with joy. Karna reflected and boasted ( $\gamma$ ). Calya ridiculed him and praised Arjuna ( $\delta$ ). Karna proceeded on his chariot with white steeds and tiger-skins, slaying large numbers in battle along his way, and inquired after Arjuna (VIII, 37), promising every Pandara soldier that he met that unto him who pointed out Arjuna to him he would give whatever wealth he desired. Duryodhana and the troops rejoiced; Calya scornfully laughed, and said (VIII, 38) that Karna would get to see Arjuna without the trouble of seeking him, and asked him to abandon his desire for a single combat with Arjuna. Karna repeated his resolution, and Calya insulted him in a long speech (VIII, 39). Karna replied angrily, describing the disreputable practices of the Madrakas (and the Gandharakas and Sindhu-Sauviras) (VIII, 40). Calya answered by praising himself and his accomplishments as a charioteer (description). and by reciting the story of the crow and the swan (Hamsakākīyopākhyāna, q.v.): "Even as that crow, fed upon the remains of the dinners of the Vaiçya children, disregarded his equals and superiors, so dost thou, that art fed by the sons of Dhrtarashtra upon the remains of their dishes, disregard all," etc. ( $\epsilon$ ) (VIII, 41). Karna said that Krohna and Arjuna were well known to him, but did not make him afraid. The curse, however, of [Paraçu-]Rāma pained him greatly. He dwelt, disguised as a brahman, with Rama in former days, desirous of obtaining celestial weapons from him. Indra, as a worm, began to pierce his thigh, on which was lying the head of the sleeping Rama; therefore he did not move. But Rama, witnessing his patience, discovered that he was not a brahman, and cursed him, saying that this weapon would nover, in the time of need, when the hour of his death came. occur to his memory. He had forgotten the weapon, but would, act with standing, slay Arjuna; he suspected Calya of secret friendship with the Pandaras; he would employ the Brahma weapon, which Arjuna would never be able to escape, if only the wheels of Karna's chariot did not sink into the earth that day; he would not take fright at Yama himself with his rod. or Varuna with his noose, or Kubera with his mace, or Indra with the thunderbolt. "Once upon a time, while wandering for the sake of practising with my bow Vijaya, I had heedlessly struck the calf of a brahman's home cow; the brahman cursed me, saying that my wheel would sink into the earth in a battle when I was in great danger. The kings of the Lunar race offered to give that brahman 1,000 kine and 600 bulls, but in vain," etc. (VIII, 42). Karna said that it was in vain that Calya tried to frighten him (ζ) (VIII, 43). Karna said that in Dhrtarashtra's abode the brahmans used to give accounts of various delightful regions and many kings of ancient times: an old brahman had said, blaming the Madrakas and the Bahikas, that they should be avoided as being out of the pale of virtue and living away from Himarat, etc. (1), but between Sindhu and its tributary rivers. On some very secret mission Karna had to live among the Bahikas, and therefore their conduct was well known to him; "there is a town Cakala, a river Apaga, and a Bahika clan Jarttikas; the practices of these people are very censurable" (description; an example is cited of a Bāhīka who happened to live for some days in Kurujāngala, and a Rá. woman in Çākala; the rivers Çatadru, etc. (0), in the countries of the Arattas, regions without virtue and religion). "D., P., and brahmans never accept gifts from those that are fullen, or those that are begotten by Cūdras on the girls of other castes, or the Bahikas, who never perform sacrifices and are exceedingly irreligious." He mentioned three impure places (1) (v. the note of PCR., p. 155). There were two Piçacas in the river Vipāçā, named Bahi and Hika; the Bāhīkas are the offspring of those two Pc.; they are not creatures created by the Creator. The Kūrashkaras, etc. (x), and other peoples of no religion one should always avoid; even thus did a Ra. woman speak to a brahman who went to that country for bathing in sacred water and passed a single night there. The regions are called Arattah, the water Bahika; the lowest brahmans have resided there from very remote times (brūhmanāpasadā yatra tulyakālāh Prajāpateh), without the Vedas, etc. The Prasthalas, etc. ( $\lambda$ ), are almost as blamcable in their practices (VIII, 44). Karna continued his description of the Bahikas (and Gandharas and Madrakas). The Arattas had been cursed by a chaste woman. The Kauravas, etc. (μ), know what the eternal religion is. Brahmán, even in the Krta age, had censured the practices of the country of the five rivers. K. quoted a saying of the Ra. Kalmāshapāda, declared by the Rakshasa to be the formula for curing a person possessed by a Ra. or killed by poison. Remarks on the Pāncālas, etc. (v), on Agni, etc. (f). Calya spoke in disparagement of the Angas (o). Duryodhana restored peace between Karna and Calya (VIII, 45) .- § 608: THE SEVEN-TRENTH DAY'S BATTLE. Beholding the array of the Parthas made by Dhrshtadyumna, Karna proceeded to battle and assailed Yudhishthira. Dhrtarashtra inquired about the disposition of the Kuru forces (a). Sanjaya described the Kaurava array: right wing  $(\beta)$ ; on the right of these  $(\gamma)$ ; the left side  $(\delta)$ ; on their left  $(\epsilon)$ ; in the centre at the head Karna with his sons; in the rear Duhçasana; and behind him Duryodhana and his brothers, protected by the united Madrakas und Kekayas; Açvatthaman, etc., with Mlecchas on elephants followed behind. The array was formed according to the plan of Brhaspati. Yudhishthira, beholding Karna, spoke to Arjuna of the hostile array: Arjuna should proceed against Karna; Bhīmasena against Duryodhana; Nakula against Vrehasena; Sahadeva againet Çakuni; Çatanika against Duhçasana; Satyaki against Krtavarman; Pandya against Acvatthaman; Yudhishthira against Krpa; the Draupadeyas with Cikhandin against the rest of the Dhartarashtras, etc. Calya pointed out to Karna the chariot of Arjuna (b) and various omens, etc. (1); how the Sumcaptakas threatened to slay Arjuna and the other heroes of the Pandava army (1), and he dissuaded him from trying to slay Arjuna. Meanwhile the two armies mingled fiercely in battle (VIII, 46). Dartarashtra usked Sanjaya about Arjuna, the Samcaptakas, and Karna. Sanjaya related: Arjuna arrayed his troops, headed by Dhrshladyumna (with stoods white as pigeons); by the side of Dhrehfadyumna the Draupadeyas. Arjuna & the Samçaptakas. The Pañoalas, etc. ( $\theta$ ), & the Kurus; Krpa, etc. (1), & the Koçalas, etc. (x); the battle became conducive to fame, heaven, and virtue for the kshatriya, vaiçya, and çūdra heroes that engaged in it. Duryodhana, etc.  $(\lambda)$  + Karna & the Pandavas, etc.  $(\mu)$ ; Kurna harassed Yudhishthira; fierce battle between the Kurus and the Srnjayas (VIII, 47). Dhrtarashtra inquired about the particulars of Karna's encounter with Yudhishthira. Sanjaya related: Karna attacked the Pancalas (and Prabhadrakas and Cedis) and made a great slaughter; among others he slew the five Pancalas Bhanudeva, etc. (v). The protectors of Karna's chariot-wheels were his sons Sushena and Satyasena, and his eldest son Vrehasena protected his rear. Dhrehtadyumna, etc. (f), & Karna + Karna's sons; Sushena & Bhimasena, who pierced him with seventy arrows and then slew Kurna's son Bhanusena; Bhimasena & Krpa, etc. (o); Bhimasena & Sushena + Karna; Sushena & Nakula + Sahadeva; Salyaki & Vrehasena, who was taken up by Duhçasana on the latter's chariot, borne away, and caused to ride in another chariot; Vrshasena & the Draupadeyas, etc. (π); Yuyudhāna & Duhçasana, whom he deprived of his chariot, etc., but who got another chariot and fought from within the division of Karna; Karna & Dhrshtadyumna, etc. (ρ); at last Karna's assailants gave way; Karna & Yudhishthira + the Cedis, etc. (a) (VIII, 48); the Dravidas, etc. (7), & Karna, who crushed them; Karna & Yudhishthira, etc. (v); Yudhishthira addressed Karna in rage  $(\phi)$ ; Karna swooned away, but recovered and slew Yudhishthira's wheel-protectors, the Pañcala princes Candradeva and Dandadhara; Yudhishthira struck Sushena and Satyanena, etc.; Satyaki, etc.  $(\chi)$ , & Karna, who invoked the Brāhma weapon; Karna doprived Yudhishthira of his chariot; Yudhishthira fled, riding in another chariot with the white steeds with black hair on their tails that used to bear him, pursued by Karna (c), who touched him with his hand, but remembered the words of Kunti and was withheld by Calya, but insulted Yudhishthira (4) and let him escape. The Cedis, etc.  $(\omega)$ , followed Yudhishthira; Karna made a great slaughter of the Pandava forces; Yudhishthira urged his forces to proceed against Karna, which they did, headed by Bhimasena (+ Sātyaki) (description); the Kurus broke and fled away (VIII, 49). Duryodhana in vain tried to stop the flying troops. Then Cakuni, etc. + Karna & Bhimasena, who let Sātyaki and Dhrshfadyumna protect Yudhishthira; Çalya pointed out Bhīma to Karņa (aa); Karņa replied (ββ); Karna swooned and was brought away by Calya (VIII, 50). Requested by Dhrtarachtra (77), Sanjaya related: Urged by Duryodhana, several Kuru leaders (δδ) assailed Bhima, who slew, among others, six sons of Dhytarūshtra ( $\epsilon\epsilon$ ). The other sons of Dhrtarashtra fled away. Karna & Bhimasena, whom he deprived of his chariot, but who then with his mace killed elephants and men by hundreds, among others fifty-two elephants belonging to Cakuni; next 3,000 horsemen dispatched by Cakuni, then he mounted another chariot and proceeded against Karna. Karna & Yudhishthira, whom he pursued as he was flying away; Bhimasena & Karna; Satyaki & Karna. Beholding Cakuni, etc. (55), the Kurus rallied when the sun had reached the meridian. Fierce battle (VIII, 51); (description) (VIII, 52). Arjuna & the Samçaptakas, etc. (171); Arjuna (+ Krshna) & Suçarman; Arjuna repeatedly invoked the Naga weapon, paralysing the legs (encircled with snakes) of the Samçaptakas; Suçarman invoked the Sauparna weapon; birds came down and devoured the snakes; Arjuna sat down, recovered, and invoked the Aindra weapon; the battle became awful (VIII. 53). Krtavarman, etc. (00), began a fierce battle; Krpa & Cikhandin (+ the Srnjayas); Cikhandin was deprived of his chariot and made inactive; Dhrshfadyumna proceeded against Krpa; Krtavarman & Dhrshtadyumna; Açvatthaman & Yudhishthira (proceeding towards the chariot of Krpa): Duryodhana & Nakula and Sahadeva; Karna & Bhimasena, etc. (u); Krpa & Çikhandin; Suketu (the son of Citraketu) & Krpa; Cikhandin retreated; Krpa slew Sukelu, whose troops fled away; Krtavarman & Dhrshtadyumna, who made him driverless and was assailed by the Kurus (VIII, 54). Acratthaman & Yudhishthira, etc. (KK) (description); Prativindhya, etc. (λλ), & Açvatthāman; Sūtyaki had his driver slain; Yudhishthira went away, leaving his division, against the Kurus; Acratthaman also left the spot (VIII, 55). Karna & Bhimasena, etc.  $(\mu\mu)$ , who, avoiding Karna, proceeded against the Kurus; Arjuna & the Samçaptakas; Bhimasena & the Kauravas; Karna & the Parcalas; Duryodhana & Nakula and Sahadeva; Dhrehtadyumna (in order to rescue Nakula and Sahadeva) & Duryodhana (d), who was rescued by his brothers and borne away by Dandadhara upon the latter's chariot. Karna (having vanquished Sātvaki and desirous of rescuing Duryodhana) & Dhrehtaduumna + Sātyaki (pursuing Karna from behind) + the Pañcalas; a fierce battle between the two armies when the sun had ascended the meridian; Karna & Vyāghraketu, etc. (vv) (description) (oo). Yudhishthira, etc. (ππ), & Karņa. Bhīmasena slow the Kurus: Bühlikas, etc.  $(\rho\rho)$  (description)  $(\sigma\sigma)$ . Arjuns addressed Krehna upon beholding Karna's (s) prowess, and seeing that the Samcaptakas were broken. Arjuna (and Krshna) broke through the Kuru host. Duryodhana once more urged the Samcaptakas against him. Having slain 10,000 kshatriyas, Arjuna came to the further wing of the Samcaptakas, which was protected by the Kambojas; the younger brother of the Kamboja chief Sudakshina was killed by Arjuna; the Kambojas, etc. (77), were slain. Acvatthaman & Arjung (+ Krshna); Si. and Ca. came; Krehna urged Arjuna not to spare Acvatthaman, who swooned and was carried away by his driver; Arjuna slew the Kuru troops. Arjuna had routed the Samçaptakas, Bhimasena the Kurus, Karna the l'ancalas. Yudhishthira, pained by his wounds, had retreated a kroça (VIII, 56). Duryodhana addressed the Kuru leaders (vv). Acvatthuman swore to slay Dhrshtadyumna or not to doff his armour  $(\phi\phi)$ . A fierce battle commenced. D., Aps., etc., came; Aps. rained flowers, etc., on the combatants (VIII, 57). Arjuna pointed out to Krshna that the Pandava army was flying away, Karna slaying their warriors, and Yudhishthira nowhere to be seen; "the third-part of the day still remains." Arjuna proceeded to Yudhishthira (+ Srnjayas); Krehna described the field of battle to Arjuna  $(\chi\chi)$ . A terrible battle commenced (VIII, 58). The Kurus (headed by Karna) & the Srijayas (Parthas, headed by Yudhishthira); a remnant only of the Samçaptakas were left alive. Dhrehtadyumna + the Pandavas (and all the kings on their side) & Karņa; Sūtyaki & Karņa; Açvatthāman & Dhrshţadyumna; Karna & the Pañealas, etc. (ψψ); Dhrshfadyumna was worsted by Acvatthaman and rescued by Arjuna; Arjuna & Acratthaman (abandoning Dhrehtadyumna); Dhrehtadyumna was brought away by Sahadeva on the latter's chariot; Acvatthaman swooned on his chariot and was carried away by his driver. Arjuna proceeded towards the Samcaptakas (VIII, 59).

Frehng pointed out to Arjuna that Yudhishthirs was being pursued by many Dhartarashiras, headed by Duryodhana. while the Pancalas were following in order to rescue him. and that he was in great danger, though the Kurus had been checked by Satyaki and Bhima, because Duryodhana, etc. (ww), would break down the very mountains; "Yudhishthirs is exceedingly emaciated in consequence of his fastings; he is endued with Brahma force, but not with much of kshatriya might"; he was surrounded by the Dhartarashira warms with the weapons Sthundkarna, etc. (aaa); in the very light of the twins, etc.  $(\beta\beta\beta)$ , Karna was destroying the Pāṇḍava division, and rushing against Bhīmasena; having vanquished the Pancalas, etc. (yyy), he would soon come against Arjuna, and he was protected by Duryodhana; he should be slain; Karna was rushing against Dhrehtadyumna in order to exterminate the Pancalas; however, Yudhishthira was living; Bhima ( + Srnjavas and Satvaki) and the Pañoalas were now conquering the Kauravas, who were flying away, Krpa and Karna, etc., resisting the Pañoalas (headed by Dhrshtadyumna); the Nishada prince (coming on his elephant against Yudhishthira) was slain by Bhima, who had checked three akshauhinis of Duryodhana's soldiers. Arjuna then destroyed the remnant of his foes; the Samçaptakas fled (VIII, 60). Requested by Dhrtarashtra (888), Sanjaya related: Karna, etc., & Bhimasena + the Pundavas, etc. (eee); Cikhandin & Karna; Dhrshtadyumna & Duhçasana; Nakula & Vrshasena (at the side of his father); Yudhishthira & Citrasona; Sahadova & Ulūka; Satycki & Cakuni; the Draupadeyas & the other Kauravas; Açvatthaman & Arjuna; Krpa & Yudhamanyu; Krtavarman & Uttamaujas; Cikhandin was deprived of his chariot by Karna and retreated; Dhrshfadyumna (+ many Pancalas) & Duhçasana: Si. and Aps., etc., wondered. Karna endeavours to rally the retreating troops of the Dhartarashiras. After Karna had gone away, Nakula proceeded against the Kauravas; Karna's son, avoiding Nakula, went to Karna in order to protect his chariot-wheel. Uluka was made driverless by Sahadeva and entered the division of the Trigartas. Cakuni ascended the chariot of Uluka, who took him away from Satyaki, who then routed the Kuru army. Duryodhana & Bhimasona, who deprived him of his chariot and bow and made him fly away; the whole Kuru army attacked Bhimasena, who Yudhamanyu retreated on his chariot, scattered them. driving it himself. Uttamaujas sat down and was taken away by his driver. The whole Kuru army attacked Bhimasena; Duhçasana and Cakuni (with an elephant force) & Bhimasena, who made Duryodhana fly away, invoked his celestial weapons, and scattered and destroyed them (description) (VIII, 61). Arjuna (with Krehna) appeared. Duryodhana (with half histroops in order to seize Yudhiehthira) & Yudhishthira, whose warriors (\( \sum\_{\substack} \sum\_{\substack} \) then came to rescue him with an akshauhini; Karna checked them all; Sahadeva (invoking a celestial weapon) & Duryodhana; Karna began an onelaught on the troops of Yudhiehthira and Dhrehtadyumna; they fled away; Karna & Yudhishthira, who sat down and ordered his driver to retreat; Duryodhana and the Dhartarashtras pursued him; but 1,700 Kskaya troops and a body of Păncăla troops checked them. Duryodhana & Bhima (VIII, 62). Karna & the Kaikayas, who fled to Bhimasena. Karna & Yudhishthira (who was proceeding slowly towards the Pandava encampment with Nakula and Sahadeva, the protectors of his chariot-wheels, on his two sides); Nakula and Sahadeva & Karna, who slew the steeds both of Yudhishthira and Nakula, who both ascended the chariot of Sahadeva; Calya, in order to rescue them, exhorted Karna to fight with Arjuna, but in vain; Yudhishthira turned from the battle; Calya ouce more reminded Karna of Arjuna, etc. (ηηη), and that Duryodhana was in danger from Bhimasena. Karna then left Yudhishthira and the twins and rushed to the rescue of Duryodhana. Yudhishthira in shame retreated with the steeds of Sahadeva, with the twins, whom he then dispatched to Bhima (VIII, 63). Accepthaman & Arjuna; Acvatthaman employed the Aindra weapon, which Arjuna baffled with a powerful weapon created by Indra; Acvatthaman, having had his driver slain, himself guided his steeds while he fought with Arjuna; then he was brought away by his steeds. The Pandavas, repeatedly charging the Kauravas, broke their ranks and caused them to fly away in the very sight of Dhṛtarāshṭra's sons, etc. (000). Duryodhana caused Karna to rally the troops; Karna, employing the Bhargava weapon, harassed the Pancalas, who, with the Codis, began to lose their senses. The Srnjayas called upon Arjuna and Vasudeva. Arjuna spoke to Krshna about Karna: Krehna reminded him first to seek Yudhishthira (VIII, 64). Ariuna met with Bhīma and asked him to bring intelligence of Yudhishthira; Bhīma feared to incur the reproach of cowardice by leaving the battle; Arjuna went to Yudhishthira in the Pandava camp upon Bhima agreeing to resist the Samcaptakas. Arjuna and Krehna found Yudhishthira lying on his bed; thinking that Kerna had been slain (VIII, 65), Yudhishthira congratulated them (111) (VIII, 66). Arjuna told Yudhishthira the real motive of his arrival in camp (KKK), and swore to slay Karna and all the foes that very day (VIII, 67). Yudhishthira consured Arjuna, thinking that he had run away from the battle, leaving Bhima unsupported (\lambda\lambda\lambda), several times invoking him to give up Gandiva to somebody else (VIII, 68). Arjuna drew his sword in order to strike off Yudhishthira's head in fulfilment of his vow about the person who would tell him to give up Gandiva (μμμ); Krshna addressed Arjuna on the nature of truth (vvv), relating the story of Balaka (f) and of Kaucika (g); Arjuna said he must keep his vow (FFF); Krshna suggested that Arjuna by insulting Yudhishthira, by addressing him as "thou," would be regarded as having slain him (ooo) (VIII, 69). Urged by Krshna, Arjuna insulted Yudhishthira in a long speech  $(\pi\pi\pi)$ ; then he became despondent and desired to strike off his own head; Krehna urged him to utter his own praises, as selfpraise is equal to self-destruction. Arjuna praised himself (ppp), and hegged for Yudhishthira's forgiveness, promising to slay Karna and rescue Bhima. Yudhishthira grieved, saying that Bhimasena, not he, ought to be king. Krehna comforted Yudhishthira and induced him to forgive both himself and Arjuna (σσσ) (VIII, 70). Speeches of Krshna, Arjuna, and Yudhishthira on the same topic (777) (VIII, 71). Arjuna proceeded to slay Karna, having obtained Yudhishthira's leave; commanded by Krehna, Daruka had equipped the chariot. Auspicious omens. Krshņa addressed Arjuna in order to raise his spirits (vvv) (VIII, 72); continuation (vvv) (VIII, Arjuna's cheerful reply to Krshna (φφφ) (VIII, 73). 74). Requested by Dhṛtarāshṭra  $(\chi \chi \chi)$ , Sañjaya related: Description of the battle; Arjuna slew many. Krpa & Cikhandin; Satyaki & Duryodhana; Crutaçravas & Açvatthaman; Yudhamanyu & Citrasena; the Spnjaya Uttamaujas & Karna's son Sushena; Sahadeva & the Gandhara king Cakuni; Nakula's son Catanika & Karna's son Vrshasena; Nakula & Krtavarman; the Pañcala king Dhrshtadyumna & Karna; Duhcasana (with the Samcaptakas in the Bharata army) & Bhima. Uttamaujas slew Sushena. Karna & Uttamaujas.

who had his steeds slain, slew the steeds of Krps, etc., and ascended the chariot of Cikhandin. Cikhandin did not wish to strike Krpa while the latter had no chariot: Acvatthaman rescued Krpa. Bhima scorched the Kuru troops with his arrows (VIII, 75). The Bharata host fled before Bhima, who said to his charioteer Viçoka that he was anxious about Ariuna and Yudhishthira; requested by Bhima, Vicoka took an estimate of his weapons. Bhima once more addressed Vicoka, saying that he would that day slay all the Kurus or himself succumb, etc. (\psi \psi \psi). Viçoka pointed out to Bhīma that Arjuna was returning to battle (www). Bhima promised to give Viçoka fourteen villages, 100 female slaves, and twenty chariots for this agreeable intelligence (VIII, 76). Arjuna and Bhima attacked the Kaurava army with great vigour (description). Duryodhana told his troops to slay Bhīma, who made a formidable carnage among them (description). Cakuni (urged by Duryodhana) + his brothers & Bhima; Cakuni was brought away by Duryodhana, who retreated; the troops fled away to Karna (VIII, 77). Requested by Dhrtarushtra (a'), Sanjaya related: In the afternoon Karna assailed the Somakas, and Bhima the Dhartarashtra troops. Karna assailed the Pañoalas, etc. (B'); the Pandavas encompassed him on all sides; Cikhandin, etc. (7'), & Karna, who vanquished them. Cedis and Mateyas & Karna, who checked them; D., Si., and Cā. were gratified; the Pāṇḍava troops fled, and were attacked by the Dhartarashtra archers. Duryodhana rejoiced; Duryodhana, etc. ( $\delta$ ), slew the Pandava warriors; similarly the Pandava heroes Dhrehtadyumna, etc. (e'), made an onslaught on the Kurus (VIII, 78). Arjuna produced a river of blood (description), Requested by Arjuna (7), Krshna took him to Karna, whom Calya informed  $(\eta')$ , and who answered Calya  $(\eta')$ . Requested by Karna, Duryodhana, etc. (6'), in order to open up a path for Karna to Arjuna, speedily proceeded and attacked Arjuna, who caused a great onslaught; Acvatthaman & Krpa and Ertavarman & Arjuna, who vanquished them. Cikhandin, etc. (i'), proceeding towards Arjuna, checked the foes; the Kurus and Srnjayas slew one another (VIII, 79). Arjuna (avoiding Karna) proceeded to the rescue of Bhima and slew the assailants of Bhima; the Kurus fled; Arjuna informed Bhīma that Yudhishihira was well, and then proceeded; he was surrounded by ten sons of Dhrtardshtra (who were all Duḥçāsana's juniors in age), whom he slew (VIII, 80). Arjuna was assailed by ninety Samcaptakas as he was proceeding towards Karna's chariot; he slew them. Many Kauravas attacked him, whom he destroyed. Then he was attacked by a force of Mlecchas, riding 1,300 elephants. commanded by Duryodhana. Arjuna made a heavy onslaught. Abandoning the small remnant of Kauravas, Bhimasena rushed towards Arjuna and also destroyed this remnant; then he followed Arjuna in his rear; Karna was deserted by his troops; the sons of Dhrtarashtra repaired to Karna. Karna attacked the Pañcalas (VIII, 81); Karna felled Janamejaya's driver and steeds, and cut off the bows of Catanika and Sutasoma; Karņa & Dhrehfadyumna, etc. (k'); Ugrakarman (the commander of the Keikeya division) & Karna's son Prasena; Karņa slew Ugrakarman; Prasena & Sātyaki, who slew him; Karna & Satyaki + Çikhandin; Karna elew Dhrehfadyumna'e son and attacked Sutasoma. Krshna urged Arjuna to elay Karna; Arjuna proceeded with Bhimasena; Uttamaujas, etc. (λ'), & Karna (grinding the Somakas), who vanquished them: they were rescued by the Draupadeyas; Satyaki & Duryodhana +  $K_{rpa}$ , etc. ( $\mu'$ ); Duhçasana & Bhima (VIII, 82).

Bhīma (addressing Karna, etc.) (µ') slew Duḥçāsana and drank his blood in the very sight of Duryodhana and Kurna; the bystanders, with Karna's brother Citrasena, fled away, thinking Bhīma to be a Rā.; Yudhāmanyu, etc., pursued Citrasena; Citrasena (turning back) was slain by him; Karna (putting the Pandava host to flight) & Nakula; Bhimasena took up a little of Buhcasana's blood and drank it (v'), addressing Krehna and Arjuna and vowing soon to slay Duryodhana (VIII, 83). Ten of Dhytarashtra's sons (f) & lihima, who slew them. Karna was afraid, but was encouraged by Calya (o'). Karna's son Vrshasena & Bhima + Nakula, who had his white steeds of the Vandyu breed slain by him, and sprang upon Bhima's chariot in the sight of Arjuna; urged by Bhima and Nakula, Arjuna proceeded towards Vrshaeena (VIII, 84). Eleven warriors  $(\pi')$  + the Kulindas (upon elephants, born in Himalayan regions) & Krtavarman, etc. (p'); the Kulinda prince & Arpa, who slew him; the younger brother of the Kulinda prince & Krpa + the Gandhara king, who slew the Kulinda; the Kurus & the Pandus & Strijayas; the Bhoja chief Kriavarman & Catanika; Accatthaman slew three elephants; the third brother of the Kulinda chief & Duryodhana; the Kulinda, mounting another elophant, & Kratha, who was slain; Vrka & the same Kulinda, whose elephant crushed him; the son of Babhru & the same elephant + Sahadeva's son; Babhru fell down; the same Kulinda & Çakuni (the Gandhara chief), who slew him; Nakula's son Catinika (who slew elephants, etc.) & a Kulinda warrior [on the Kaurava side], who was slain by him; Karņa's son Vrshasena & Çatānīka + Arjuna, etc. (σ'); Arjuna, informing Karna and all the other Kurus headed by Duryodhana and Acvatthaman that he would slav Vrshasena and then Karna, as Bhima would slay Duryodhana, slew Vrehasena; Karna & Arjuna (+ Krehna) (VIII, 85); Krehna addressed Arjuna ( $\tau'$ ); Arjuna's reply ( $\upsilon'$ ) (VIII, 86); description of Arjuna and Karna ( $\phi'$ ); all the inhabitants of the world were heard to differ amongst themselves: D., Da., G., Pç., the Snakes, Ra.; As., Yatudhanas, Gh., etc., sided with Karna; the Vedas, etc.  $(\chi')$ , with Arjuna; the smaller snakes all sided with Karna; V., M., Sa., R., V.-D., A., Agni, etc.  $(\chi')$ , sided with Arjuna, while all  $\bar{\Lambda}$ . sided with Karna; the Vaiçyas, etc.  $(\psi')$ , sided with Karna; P., etc.  $(\chi')$ , with Arjuna; the Protac, Pg., Ra., etc., with Karna; D.-r., B.-r., R.-r. with Arjuna, as also G. headed by Tumburu. With the Pradheyas and Mauneyas, G. and Aps., and many wise sages, having for their vehicles wolves, etc., came in order to witness the encounter that was also witnessed by D., Då., G., N., Y., etc., M.-r., P. (subsisting upon svadhā), etc., and Brahmán with B.-r. and Prajapatis and Bhava. Indra wished that Arjuna should vanquish Karna; Surva that Karna should vanquish Arjuna. The gods urged Brahman that the success of both should be equal, Indra that Arjung and Krehng should win; Brahman and Içang (i.e. Civa) said that the victory of Arjuna was certain (ω'); "let Karna obtain identity with V. or M.; let him with Drona and Bhishma be worshipped in heaven." Inara acquiesced in their words. Description of Karna's and Arjuna's chariots. The ape on Arjuna's banner attacked the elephant's rope on Karna's banner. Krshna und Calya cast keen glances at each other, and so did Arjuna and Karna. Karna asked Calya what he would do if he was slain; Calya said that then he would slay both Krshna and Arjuna; similarly asked by Arjuna, Krehna said that Karna could not slay Arjuna; if so, the destruction of the universe would be at hand, and he would himself slay Karns and Calys, Arjuna said that that very day the wives of Karna would become widows (ad') (VIII, 87). In the welkin D., N., As., Si., Y., G., Ra., Aps., B.-r., etc., looked on. The battle commenced. Duryodhana, etc. (αβ'), & Arjuna (+ Kṛshna); Arjuna defeated all of them; floral showers fell, etc.; Acrathaman told Duryodhana to make peace (ay'), but in vain (ab'); Duryodhana urged his troops (VIII, 88); description of the battle between Arjuna and Karna; Arjuna employed an Agneya weapon, which was quenched by Karna with a Varuna weapon by means of clouds, which Arjuna dispelled by a Vayavya weapon; Arjuna employed the Aindra weapon (?astram dayitam devarājnah), Karna the Bhargava wenpon. The Pañcalas and Somakas & Karna, who slew them. Seeing Arjuna's weapons buffled by Karna, Bhima urged Arjuna to put forth his strength (as'), and so did Krshna (at'). Arjuna bowed to Brahmán and invoked the Brāhma weapon, which could be applied by the wind alone; Karna baffled it; urged by Bhīma, Arjuna applied a second Brāhma weapon, which caused a great carnage among the Kaurava troops (description). Karna & Bhimasena, etc. (an'). Arjuna shot at Karna and Calva, and slew Sabhāpati, etc. The Kauravas urged Karna to slay Arjuna. Yudhishthira appeared in order to witness the encounter. Arjuna's bowstring broke; Karna took advantage of the interval to hit Arjuna, etc. (a6'). Karna employed as arrows five snakes that had sided with Takshaka's son [i.e. Açvasena, at Khandava]; they penetrated Krehna's body, entered the earth, and, having bathed [in Bhogavati], returned to Karna, but were cut off by Arjuna, who then covered Karna's chariot with showers of arrows and slew 2,000 Kurus, who had been urged by Duryodhana to fight. The Kurus fled, leaving Karna to fight singly with Arjuna (VIII, 89). Karna baffled Arjuna's weapon; Karna and Arjuna shot at each other dense showers of arrows. The snake Açvasena, who was hostile to Arjuna, was passing his time in the nether region, having escaped from the conflagration at Khandava; recollecting the death of his mother he now soared up and entered into Karna's quiver in the shape of an arrow. Karna and Arjuna were fanned and sprinkled with fragrant sandal water by many Aps. staying in the welkin, and Cakra and Surya with their hands gently brushed their faces. Karna aimed that arrow, born in Airavata's race (i.e. the snake in the shape of an arrow), which he had long kept for Arjuna's destruction, and which lay singly in a golden quiver amid sandal dust; omens appeared, and the Lokapālas with Çakra raised loud wails. Karna did not know that the snake Açvasona had entered his arrow by the aid of his yoga powers. Calya in vain exhorted Karna to take another arrow; Karna said: "Karna never aims an arrow twice; persons like us never become crooked warriors." Krshņa with his feet pressed Arjuna's chariot about a cubit into the earth, and the snake-arrow, failing to strike off Arjuna's head, broke his diadem (made by Svayambhū for Indra > Arjuna), incapable of being crushed by Rudra, etc. (at'). Colestial flowers were showered upon Krehna, etc. Acrasena appeared to Karna and asked him to shoot the same weapon again; Karna refused to avail himself of another's help or shoot the same shaft twice. Acrasena then, of his own accord, rushed on Arjuna in the shape of an arrow; Krshna informed Arjuna that it was Acvasena, who, as an unborn child, was saved with his mother at Khandava. Arjuna cut the snake into pieces, and Krehna with his arms raised the chariot from the earth. Once, when Karna was stupefied and stood inactive, Arjuna was disinclined to slay him in such distress, but he was taught by Krehna never to spare an enemy, however weak. At that time, when the hour of Karna's death had come, Kala, approaching invisibly, in consequence of the brahman's wrath, said "the earth is swallowing up thy wheel," and the weapon that Rama had given him escaped from his memory, and the earth engulfed his left wheel. Karna began to rail at righteousness as not always protecting its worshippers. Karna invoked the Brahma weapon, and Arjuna the Aindra weapon, which was buffled by Karna; urged by Krshna to "shoot high weapons," Arjuna shot the Brahma weapon. Karna cut off, one after another, eleven bowstrings of Arjuna's, not knowing that Arjuna had one hundred strings to his bow; urged by Krshna to strike Karna with "superior weapons," Arjuna then consecrated another celestial weapon with mantras, uniting the Raudra weapon with it. At that time the earth swallowed up one of Karna's wheels. Quickly alighting, Karna seized his sunken wheel with his two arms and endeavoured to lift it up; the earth rese up to the height of four fingers breadth, with her seven islands, etc.; Karna shed tears from wrath and asked Arjuna to wait for a moment till he had lifted his sunken wheel (VIII, 90). Krehna taunted Karna for appealing to virtue and the rules of fair fight by reminding him of all the wrongs done to the Pandavas by himself and Duryodhana acting according to his counsels (ak'). Karna dropped his head in shame and gave no answer, and continued to fight. Krehna urged Arjuna to pierce Karna with a celestial weapon; Arjuna, remembering the incidents alluded to by Krshna, blazed up with fury; blazing flames of fire seemed to emanate from all the porcs of his body, a sight that appeared exceedingly wonderful. Both Karna and Arjuna invoked the Brahma weapon, and Karna once more made an effort to extricate his chariot. Arjuna shot an Agni weapon, quenched by Karna with a Varuna weapon, covering all the points of the compass with darkness, which Arjuna dispelled with the Vayavya weapon. Pierced by a shaft of Karna's, while the earth trembled, etc., Arjuna began to reel, the Gandiva dropped from his hand, etc. At the interval Karna fruitlessly endeavoured to extricate his chariot. Recovering his senses, Arjuna took up an anjalika weapon. Urged by Krahna to cut off the head of Kurna, Arjuna cut off his standard, and then, with an anjalika weapon (the R. loudly crying out "peace be to the universe"), struck off Karna's head before Karna could mount his chariot. A light issued from Karna's body and entered the Sun. The Pandavas rejoiced  $(a\lambda')$ (VIII, 91). Duryodhana, etc., grieved; Bhima, uttering loud roars, frightened the Kauravas, etc. (au'). Calya informed Duryodhana of Karna's death (av'). Duryodhana became almost deprived of his senses (VIII, 92). Requested by Dhytardehtra, Sanjaya related the state of the Kaurava army after Karna's fall (af'). Duryodhana resolved to make a final stand (ao'). Bhimasena and Dhrehtadyumna (+ four kinds of forces) & Duryodhana (+ 25,000 warriors on foot, who were slain); Arjuna & the chariot force of the Kauravas; Nakula, etc. (απ'), & Çakuni; the Kurus fled away; Cekilāna, etc. (ap'), blew their conches. Duryodhana challenged all the Pandavas and fought with them with great valour; he rallied the remnants of his troops and exhorted them to fight  $(a\sigma')$ ; they fied away heedless of his words (VIII, 93). Calya described to Duryodhana the carnage on the field (ar'), and urged the withdrawal of the troops to their nightly quarters.

Having repeatedly comforted Duryodhana, they retired headed by Acvatthaman. Karna did not lose his splendour. D., R., etc., retired. The portents that were seen at Karna's fall. Arjuna and Krehna blew their conches, at which the Kauravas left the field, deserting Çalya and Duryodhana. D., G., men, Ca., M.-r., Y., and M.-U. congratulated Krehna and Arjuna (VIII, 94). Enumeration of the Kauravas retiring from the field (av'). Urged by Krshna (a\phi'), who told Dhrshtadyumna, etc.  $(a\chi')$ , to stand there with care, Arjuna presented himself to Yudhishthira, who, rising from his bed, greeted Arjuna and Krshna; Krshna congratulated Yudhishthira (a\psi'), who ascribed his success to Krshna's influence  $(a\omega')$ . Yudhishthira, with Krehna and Arjuna, came back to the field to have a look at Karna's body. The kings, filled with joy, approached Yudhishthira and gladdened him greatly; so Nakula, etc. (βa'). Dhrtarashtra and Gandhari swooned away and were comforted by Vidura, Sanjaya, and the Kuru ladies. [Khadgotpattikathana(m)] (the narrative of the origin of the sword). § 656 (cf. Apaddh.): Nakula (b) questioned Bhishma as to which (the sword or the bow) is really the foremost of weapons, and how the sword was first created and for what purpose, and who was the first instructor in the use of that weapon. Bhishma related that in ancient times the universe was one vast expanse of water, enveloped in darkness, etc. There Pitāmaha (i.e. Brahmán) took his birth, he then created wind, fire, etc., and then assuming a visible form he begot Marici, etc. (a) [and Pracetas; the last begot ] Daksha (c). When Sarvalokapitāmaha (i.e. Brahmán) had called into existence all creatures he promulgated the eternal religion laid down in the Vedas. That religion was accepted by the gods with their preceptors and priests, and by A., V., R., S., M., A., Bhrgu, Atri, Angiras, Si., the Kacyapas, Vasishtha, etc. (3); all of them lived in obedience to Brahmán. But the foremost of the Danavas, Hiranyakaçipu, etc. (7), and many other Daityas and Danavas, filled with wrath and covetousness, took delight in all kinds of wicked acts, etc. wielding only the rod of chastisement; those foremost of Asuras forsook every kindly intercourse with other creatures. Then Brahmán with the Brahmarshis proceeded to a delightful summit of Himavat, and after 1,000 years he arranged a sacrifice. From the sacrificial five arose Asi ("the sword") (d), which Brahmán gave to Rudra (i.e. Civa) in order to enable him to put down irreligion. Rudra (description) with the sword destroyed and dispersed the Asuras (Danavas); some of them penetrated into the bowels of the earth, others got under the cover of the mountains, some went upwards, others entered the depths of the sen. Rudra then gave the sword to Vishnu, Vishnu to Marici, Marici to the maharshis, the maharshis to Vāsava (i.e. Indra), Mahendra (i.e. Indra) to the lokapālas, the lokapalas to Manu (e) the son of Surya. He gave it to his son Kshupa. Thence it passed successively to Ikshvāku. etc. (8), from Drong to Krpa, from Krpa to thee (Nakula) and thy brothers. Krttikah is the nakshatra of the sword, Agni its deity, Robini its gotra, Rudra its high preceptor. Its eight mysterious names are Asi, etc. ( $\epsilon$ ). Of all weapons the sword is the foremost; the Puranas truly declare that it was first wielded by Maheçvara (i.e. Civa). Prthu (Vainya) (f) created the first bow. Persons skilled in weapons should always worship the sword. Blessing to the reader (XII, 166).

Khāndavadāha ("the burning of the Khāndava forest"): § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 316 ("ākhyam parva, i.e. Khāndavadahanaparvan).

[Khandavadahanaparvan(°va)], the 19th of the minor parvans, in C., including also Mayadarçanaparvan, in all I, 222-34 (cf. Khāṇḍavadāha). § 254: At the instance of Dhrtarashtra and Bhishma the Pandavas at Indraprastha began to bring other kings under their sway. All the subjects lived happily. Once, in the summer, Arjuna and Krshna sported on the banks of the Yamuna with Draupadi and Subhadra, etc. They were then approached by a brahman. whose complexion was like molten gold (I, 222). It was Agni. He asked them to help him to consume the forest of Khandava and the creatures therein; for Indra always prevented him from consuming it, because he was a friend of the Naga Takshaka, who dwelt there with his followers and family.- §§ 255-6, a (Agniparābhava, q.v.): the antecedents of the Khandavad. (I, 223, 224).-§ 256, b: Arjuna said that he wanted a stronger bow and inexhaustible arrows, and a resplendent chariot to ride in, and that Krshna needed a weapon with which he could slay Nagas and Piçacas (I, 224). - § 257: Then Agni thought of Varuna (b), who presented Arjuna with: (1) the Gandiva bow (c); (2) two inexhaustible quivers: (3) a chariot voked with horses. Then Agni gave to Krshna: (1) a discus (Sudarçana) (d). Varuna, after this, gave to Kṛshṇa: (2) the mace Kaumodakī (e). They were then ready to fight, and Agni began to consume the forest (I, 225).-§ 258: Arjuna and Krshna prevented the creatures from escaping. Even the gods became afraid and applied to Indra. Indra poured down showers of rain, that were at first dried up in the sky by the heat of the fire (I, 226). When more rain was poured down, Arjuna dispelled it with a shower of his weapons. Takshaka was not present, having gone to Kurukshetra. But his son Açvasena was there; his mother, a she-snake, attempted to swallow him, but had her head cut off by Arjuna; Indra, raising a violent wind, for a moment deprived Arjuna of his consciousness, during which time Acvasona effected his escape, being cursed by Krshna, Arjuna, and Agni ("never shalt thou be famous"). Indra assailed Arjuna with clouds, which were dispersed by the Vayavya weapon, and with a shower of stones, and with a peak from the Mandara, but in vain. Garutmat (Garuda) and other birds, and Nagas, who also assailed Krshna and Arjuna, were vanquished; and As., G., Y., Ra., and Nagus were defeated by Arjuna, as were the Dai. and Da. by Krshna with his discus. They were also attacked by Yama with his death-dealing mace, Kubera with his spiked club, Varuna with his noose and beautiful missile, Skauda with his long lance, the Acvins with resplendent plants, Dhatr with his bow, Jaya with a thick club, Tvashtr with a huge mountain, Sūrya with a bright çakti, Mṛtyu with a battleaxe, Aryaman with a bludgeon furnished with sharp spikes, Mitra with a discus sharp as a razor, Pūshan, Bhaga, Savitr, R., V., M., V.-D., and S. (I, 227). With his discus Krshna slaughtered Pc., N., Ra., Da., As., etc. The gods retired from the scene. Indra became filled with joy and applauded Krshna and Arjuna. An incorporeal voice addressed him, saying that Takshaka was in Kurukshetra, and that Krshna and Arjuna, being the old rshis and gods Nara and Nārāyana, were invincible, and that the destruction of the forest of Khandava had been ordained by fate. Then also Indra went back to heaven. The Vidyadharas, etc., dwelling in that forest, all became frightened. Agni, drinking the nectarlike stream of animal fat, became filled with joy. When the Asura Maya, the brother of Namuci, was about to be slain by Krshna and burnt by Agni, Arjuna rescued him. Agni burnt the forest for fifteen days, sparing only six of its dwellers: Açvasena, Maya, and four çārngakas (a sort of birds, Nīl.) (I, 228).- § 259 (Çārngakopākhyāna, q.v.): I. 229, 1-234, 4, (8331-8464). - § 260: When Agni had consumed fat, marrow, and flesh in abundance, and burnt the forest for fifteen days, he became gratified and extinguished himself. Indra, with M., appeared before Krshna and Arjuna, and granted them a boon. Arjuna asked him to give him all his weapons (both the Agneya and the Vayavya), and Indra promised to give them when Mahadeva had been pleased with him. To Krshna he granted that his friendship with Arjuna should be eternal. Then he ascended to heaven with the celestials. Arjuna, Vasudeva, and the Danava Maya. having wandered a little, sat down on the bank of a river (I, 234).

[Kicakavadhaparvan] ("the slaughter of the Kicakas"), the 54th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr. § 551: The Pandavas thus passed ten months in Matsya's city. As the year was about to expire, Kicaka, the senapati and brotherin-law of Virāta, became enamoured of Krshnā, who rebuked him and warned him of the Gandharvas, her husbands (IV, 14). Then he caused Sudeshnū (Kaikeuī) to send Krshnā to him to fetch wine. Kṛshnā adored the Sun, who commanded a Rākshasa to protect her invisibly (IV, 15). As Kīcaka seized her, she dashed him to the ground and rushed to Yudhishthira, followed by Kicaka, who brought her down and seized her by the hair, but the Rakshasa gave him a push, so that he fell down senseless. Yudhishthira, apprehensive of discovery, commanded Bhimasena to forbear. Kṛshnā rebuked Virāta and was praised by the courtiers, but sent back to Sudeshna by Yudhishthira: "the Gandharyas will surely dispel thy woe." Sudeshnā said: "I shall cause Kīcaka to be slain, if thou wishest it." Kṛshṇā answered: "Even others will slay him" (IV, 16). Krshnā rose up at night and proceeded to Bhīmasena (IV, 17), and complained of their plight and especially that of Sahadeva (b) (IV, 18-21). Bhimasena exhorted her to endure a little longer, reminding her of Sukanyā, Indrasenā (c), Sītā, Lopāmudrā, and Sāvitrī (IV, 21), and said: "To-morrow evening you should manage to have a meeting with Kīcaka in the dancing hall, but so that others may not espy thee." Kicaka came to the rendezvous and was slain by Bhīmasena, and Kṛshṇā said to the keepers of the dancing-hall: "Kicaka has been slain by my Gandharva husbands" (IV, 22). Kicaka's relatives obtained permission from Virața to cremate Kṛshṇā with him, and carried her towards the burning-place. She cried "Jaya", etc. (a). Bhimasena hearing it, came and slew 105 of them with a tree (IV, 23). Virāta got afraid and caused Sudeshņā to ask Kṛshnā to leave the country, but she obtained permission to remain for thirteen days (IV, 24).

[Kītopākhyāna] ("the episode relating to the worm"). § 762b (Ānuçūsanik.). Bhīshma said: In days of old, when the emancipated (Brahmabhūtah) brahman Vyāsa roamed over the world, he saw a worm speedily moving on a chariot-road. Asked by Vyāsa, who was omniscient and knew the language of every animal, the worm said that it was running away from a large cart, lest it should be killed; every creature, in whatever situation it may be placed, becomes attached to it; "in even this order of being I am happy, I think, and wish to live"; in his former life he was a cruel Cudra, a usurer, etc., never dedicating food to D. and P., etc. (description); he now was filled with repentance and grief; he had, however, worshipped his old mother, and once showed hospitality to a brahman; in consequence thereof the memory had not forsaken him, and he thought he should once more regain happiness (XIII, 117). Vydsa said: "It is the consequence of a meritorious act of mine that thou art not stupefied; in consequence of my penances I am able to rescue a being of demerit by the simply granting him sight of my person; there is no stronger power than that of penances. Thou mayst again attain to righteousness and merit; the state of a worm is really fraught with great misery. The superior brahman worships the Sun and the Moon uttering mantras; when thou hast attained to that state, I shall impart to thee Brahman." The worm remained and was killed by the cart. He was reborn in diverse orders of being, such as a porcupine, Iguana, boar, deer, bird, Candala, Cudra, and Vaiçya. Born at last as a Kshatriya (with Kamboja steeds, Satas and Magadhas, etc.; description) through the grace of Vyāsa, he came and worshipped him. Vyāsa said that the sin of his former life had yet not been destroyed; he should become a brahman by giving up his life on the field of battle for the sake of cows or brahmans; performing many sacrifices he should attain to heaven, and after emancipation (Brahma-bhūtah) he should enjoy eternal happiness. The ascending order of transmigration is: († v. 5774) animal > Çūdra > Vaiçya > Kshatriya > Brahman > Svarga (XIII, 118). He betook himself to severe austerities; Vyāsa went to him and said that the penances of the Kshatriyas consist in the protection of all creatures; thereby he should attain to the state of a brahman. Then he protected his subjects rightcously, and after death became a brahman. Vydsa came and told him not to fear death, but only the loss of righteousness. He caused the earth to be marked with 100 sucrificial stakes, and then obtained a residence in the egion of Brahmán himself, and obtained the eternal Bráhman by his own acts, according to the words of Vyāsa. Also the Kshatriyas, who have been slain on the field of Kurukshetra], have attained to a meritorious end (gatim punyam); therefore, do not mourn on their account" (XIII, 119).

among men; (10) having been Nardyana, he became Hari, Brahmán, Sürya, Dharma, Dhāle, Yama, Anala, Vüyu, Vaigravana, Rudra, Kūla, the firmament (kham), the earth, and the ten directions, etc.; (11) in the forest of Caitraratha he gratified the highest god with sacrifices and at each sacrifice he offered gold by hundreds of thousands; (12) becoming Vishne, the son of Aditi, and the younger brother of Indra, he, even while a child, pervaded, in three steps, the heaven, the firmament, and the carth, and, standing in the abode of the Sun (Adityasadane, B. however has Adityasyandane, i.e. in the chariot of the Sun), outshone him by his splendour; (13) in thousands of incarnations (pradurbhaveshu) he slew sinful Asuras by hundreds; (14) he cut the bonds of Muru (v. BR. s.v. Maurava), killed Nisunda and Naraka, and again rendered safe the road of Pragjyotisha; (15) he slew Aherts at Jarathi (a river, BR.; a city, Nil.), and also Kratha, Cicupala with his adherents, Jardsandha, Caibya, and Catadhanvan; (16) on his chariot, roaring like clouds, he conquered his queen, the daughter of the Bhoja king (Bhojyam) by defeating in battle Rukmin; (17) he slew Indradyumna and the Yarana Kaçerumat; (18) he slew Calva, the lord of Saubha, and destroyed Saubha; (19) at Iravati he slew Bhoja, who was equal to Kartavirya in battle; (20) he slew Gopati and Talaketu; (21) he had appropriated to himself the wealthy (bhogavatīm) and holy Drārakā, beloved by the rshis (so PCR., who has read rshikantam instead of rshikam tam) and will again submerge it within the ocean; (22) at the end of the yuga he had contracted all beings and withdrawn the whole universe into his own self; (23) in the beginning of the yuga Brahman sprung from the lotus of his navel; (24) when the Danavas Madhu and Kaifabha were bent upon slaying Brahmán, there sprang from his (i.e. K.'s) forehead Cambhu (i.e. Civa), the holder of the trident (Culapanih) with three eyes (Trilocanah); thus these two foremost deities (i.e. Brahmán and Çiva) had sprung from his body to do his work; this Nārada had told; (25) the deeds he performed when a boy, assisted by Baladeva, never had been done nor would be done by others; (26) he dwelt on Kailāsa together with brahmans.—K. said to Arjuna: "Thou art mine and I am thine, those who are mine are also thine, he who hates thee hates me, and he who follows thee follows me; thou art Nara and I am Hari Narayana; we are the rshis Nara and Narayana born in the world [of men] in time (i.e. for a special purpose, PCR.); thou art the same as I and I am the same as thou; there is no difference between us." -Draupadī said: "(1) They say that in the creation of beings thou art the one Prajapati; (2) Asita Devala called thee the creator of all worlds; (3) Jāmadagnya (so B.) said that thou art Vishnu, the sacrifice, the sacrificer, and he to whom the sacrifice is performed; (4) the rshis call thee Forgiveness and Truth; (5) Kacyapa said that thou art sacrifice sprung from truth; (6) Nareds called thee the lord of the lords of the Sadhyas, gods and cives, the creator and the lord of all things; thou sportest with the hosts of the gods, including Brahmán, Çankara, and Çakra, etc., even as a child with his toys; the firmament is covered by thy head and the earth by thy feet, these worlds are thy womb, thou art the eternal Purusha; thou art the best of the rshis, sanctified with Vedic lore, etc. . . the refuge of the rajarshis . . . the supreme Lord of all creatures celestial and human": III, 12, 471, 472, 474, 475, 477, 482, 485, 487, 501.- \$ 317 (Arjunabhigamanap.): III, 12, 503, 521, 525, 534 (father of Pradyumna), 538, 542, 544, 575, 577, Having smashed the Gandharas and vanquished the sons of Nagnajit he forcibly liberated king Sudarçana from confinement. He slew the Pandya king by striking his breast (kapūfena (?), v. the note of PCR., p. 174) and moved down the Kalingas in buttle. The city of Varanasi was burned by K. and remained for many years without a king. Ekalarya, the king of the Nishadas, who could not be defeated by others, always used to challenge K. to battle, but slain by him he lay dead like the Asura Jambha violently thrashed on a hillock. Having Baladeva for his second he slew Ugrasena's wicked son (i.e. Kamsa) scated in court in the midst of the Vrshnis and the Andhakas, and then gave the kingdom to Ugrasena. He fought with Calva, and at the gate of Saubha he with his hands caught the fierce cataghat. The Asuras had a city named Pragjyotisha, which was formidable, inaccessible, etc. It was there that Naraka Bhauma kept the ear-rings of Aditi, which he had stolen; the gods with Cakra (i.e. Indra) at their head were incapable of conquering him, and therefore employed K. to destroy these Asuras. At the city of Nirmocana K. slew 6,000 Asuras, and having cut their paçah kehurantah, he slew Muru and crowds of Rakshasas (ogharakshah, which by Nil. is taken as a Rakshasa named Ogha), and then he entered that city. It was there that an encounter took place between Naraka and Vishnu (i.e. Krshna); slain by K., Naraka lay lifeless like a karnikara-tree uprooted by the wind. When he had slain Naraka and Muru and recovered the ear-rings, K. came back and the gods granted him boons: "fatigue will never be thing in fight; neither the firmament nor the waters shall stop thy course, nor shall weapons penetrate thy body ": V, 48, †1884, †1889, †1891 ( Vishnoh), †1892, †1894. -§-561 (do.): V, 48, [†1895 (Vishnum)], †1896 (friend of the Pandavas).—§ 561d (Nara-Nārāyanau): V, 49, 1936 (K. is identical with Narayana, Arjuna with Nara).—§ 561 (Yanasandhip.): V, [49, 1939 (Çankhacakragadahastam . . . [Krtaghnopakhyana(m)] ("the episode about an ungrateful person"). § 658b (Apaddh.): Bhishma related: Gaujama, a brahman, belonging to the middle country, devoid of Wedic learning. entered a village desirous of obtaining charity. In that village lived a robber (dasyu), possessed of great wealth, devoted to the brahmans, etc. He gave to Gautama a piece of new cloth, a widowed (bhartra virahitam) young woman, and a house. Gautama lived happily in that village of aborigines (cabarulays) for many years, helping the relatives of his wife, the female slave (dasi). He began to practise archery, and went into the woods and killed wild cranes (cakrangan), etc., in abundance, and became like one of the robbers. One day a brahman, devoted to the study of the Vedas, etc., and who did never accept any food if given by a Cadra, came to the house of his ancient friend Gautama. Seeing Gautama, who resembled a cannibal, he exhorted him to abandon his sinful mode of life. Gautama, repenting, agreed to leave this village next morning with his guest, who passed the night there, refraining touching anything (though hungry) (XII. 168). Next morning, when the guest had left the house, Gautama proceeded towards the sea, having met with a caravan of merchants. The caravan was assailed by an infuriated elephant, but Gautama managed to escape, and fled towards the north, not knowing whither he proceeded, wandering alone in the forest like a kimpurusha. At last he reached a delightful forest, resembling the very woods of Nandana, and inhabited by Y. and K., adorned with Calas, etc., with Bharundas (having faces resembling those of human beings), Bhulingas, etc. Under a delightful banyan-tree (description) he fell asleep; when the sun had set, the king of cranes, Nadijangha or Rajadharman, Kacyapa's son, the child of a celestial maiden (devakanyasutah), one of the daughters of Daksha (v. 6343), and possessed of great wisdom and a friend of Brahmán, came home from Brahmaloka. Exhausted with hunger and thirst, Gautama thought of slaving him. Nadijangha welcomed Gautama, and asked him to stay with him till the next morning (XII, 169). He, who equalled Yama himself in his knowledge of duties, made for him a bed of the cala flowers, and offered him large fishes from the Bhagirathi, etc. Learning that he was desirous of going to the sea in order to earn wealth, he, quoting Brhaspati as to the fourfold means of earning wealth, directed him in the morning to his friend, the chief of the Rakshasas, Virapaksha, about 3 yojanas away. Gautama reached the city of Meruvraja (description), and was welcomed by Virapaksha (XII, 170). Though not satisfied with Gautama's antecedents, Virupuksha, because Gautama was a brahman, and for the sake of Rajadharman, entertained him with the 1,000 brahmans that were to be entertained in his house on the day of full moon of the Karttika month (description). Some amongst them were selected to represent the V.-D., P., and the deities of fire. This he did every year on the Ashadhī and Maghī, and especially on the Karttiki, after the expiry of the autumn, giving away gold, jewels, etc.; on this one day there was no fear of  $R\bar{a}$ . Gautama came away with much wealth, and returned to Rajadharman, who welcomed him. Having no food to live on by the way, he thought of slaying Rajadharman (XII, 171). This he did; having plucked off the feathers and the down, he roasted the flesh, and taking it up together with the gold he had brought, he quickly fled from the spot. The next day Virupakeha became anxious because he had not for two mornings and two nights seen Rajadharman, who when returning from Brahmaloka every morning never went home without paying him a visit; he suspected that Gautama had slain him, and sent his son with other Ra. to inquire after him. Gautama was caught and brought to Meruvraja; as the Ra. refused to eat the flesh of that great sinner, he was backed into pieces, which were given away to the robbers. But the very robbers, though cannibals, refused to eat the flesh of that vile man (XII, 172). Virāpāksha caused a funeral pyre, etc., to be made for Rajadharman. At that time the goddess Surabhi, the daughter of Daksha, appeared in the sky above the pyre; from her mouth froth mixed with milk fell upon the funeral pyre, and Rajadharman became revived. Indra came and related that once Rajadharman had absented himself from Brahmaloka and was cursed by Brahman, who said that he should not die soon; "therefore he has come back to life." Asked by Rajadharman on behalf of his "dear friend Gautama", Indra sprinkled ampta over Gautama, and restored him to life. Rajadharman embraced him with great joy. dismissed him with his wealth, and returned home. At the due hour he repaired to Brahmaloka and was honoured by Brahman. Gautama begot many sinful children upon his Cudra wife. According to a heavy curso denounced upon him by the gods, he afterwards had to sink into a terrible hell for many years. "All this was recited to me formerly by Nārada."

Kurukshetrakathana(m) ("relation of Kurukshetra") § 615kk (Buladevat.): The R. said to Bala-Rama: This Samantapañcaka is said to be the eternal northern altar of Prajapati; there, in days of yore, the gods performed a great sacrifice. The R.-r. Kuru had cultivated this field for many years; hence it came to be called Kurukesheira ("the field of Kuru"). Requested by Bala-Rama, the R. related: In days of yore Kuru was engaged in perseveringly tilling this field; requested by Indra, he said: "Those that will die upon this plain, shall proceed to regions of bliss after being cleansed of their sins." Cakra, ridiculing this, went back to heaven. This happened repeatedly. Indra summoned the gods, who asked him to stop Kuru by granting him a boon; "if men, by only dying there, were to come to heaven, without having performed sacrifices to us, our very existence would be endangered." Indra then came, and they agreed that Kuru should not toil any more; but those that would die there, having abstained from food, with all their senses awake, and those that would perish there in battle, should go straight to heaven. It was sanctioned by all the principal gods, headed by Brahmán, that on earth there should be no more sacred spot than this; those men that performed austere penances here would all, after laying down their bodies, go to Brahmán's abode; those who gave away their wealth here would soon have their wealth doubled; those who would reside constantly here would never have to behold the region of Yama; those kings that would perform great sacrifices here would reside as long in heaven as carth would last. Indra had himself composed a verse here and sung it: "The very dust of Kurukshetra . . . shall cleanse persons of wicked acts and carry them to heaven." The principal gods, brahmans, kings as Nrga, etc., having performed costly sacrifices here, have, after abandoning their bodies, proceeded to heaven. The space between Tarantuka and Arantuka and the lakes of Rama (Ramahradanam) and Macakruka (C. okrao), this Kurukshetra-Samantapañcaka is called the northern altar of Prajapati. All that Cakra said was approved by Brahman, Vishnu, and Maheçvara (IX, 53).

- Lankāpraveça ("the entry into Lankā"). § 536 (cf. Rāmopākhyānap.). Rāvaņa made Lankā yet more strong and armed his warriors. Rāma sent the monkey Angada as messenger to Rāvaṇa. Angada delivered the message of Rāma: "Release Sītā." Rāvaṇa became furious. Angada leaped up with four Rākshasas and then let them fall; then he leaped over the walls of Lankā and informed Rāma. Rāma, Lakshmaṇa, Vibhīshaṇa, and Jāmbavat with monkeys and bears attacked Lankā and pulled down the fortifications. Then the host of the Rākshasas set out at the command of Rāvaṇa. A great battle ensued; at last Rāma withdrew his troops (111, 284).

Narada informed Yudhishthira about religion, pleasure, and profit, in the form of questions about his conduct. By following his advice Yudhishthira conquered the whole earth (II, 5). Yudhishthira answered that he observed all those rules. Then he asked Narada if he had ever seen a palace like his. Narada (Brahmarshik, v. 281) replied that no palace among men was like his, but that he would describe unto him the palaces of Pitraja (i.e. Yama), Varuna, Indra, the dweller on Kailasa (i.e. Kubera), and Brahman, always worshipped by gods, Pitre and Sadhyas, etc. (II, 6).-§ 266: Cakrasabhāvarņana (q.v.).-§ 267: Yamasabhavarnana (q.v.).—§ 268: Varunasabhavarnana (q.v.) — § 269: Vaiçravanasabhararnana (q.v.).-§ 270: Brahmasabhāvarņana (q.v.).—§ 271: Yudhishthira said: It appears that almost all the monarchs are in the sabha of Yama—the Nagas, Daityas, rivers, and oceans in that of Varuna—the Yakshas, Guhyakas, Rakshasas, Gandharvas, Apsarases, and Civa in that of Kubera—the great rshis, and gods, and castras in that of Pitamaha (i.e. Brahmán); and in that of Cakra (i.e. Indra) gods, Gandharvas and various rehis, but only one king, the rajarshi Hariccandra (b); this is explained by Narada. Pandu, beholding the good fortune of Hariceandra, had asked Narada to tell Yudhishthira to subjugate the whole earth and then perform a rajasuya. Thereby also Pandu and his ancestors would go to the region of Indra. Brahmarakshases, that destroy the sacrifices, always look for opportunities of obstructing it. Then Narada went away to the city of the Daçarhas, accompanied by the rahis with whom he had come (II, 12). Lokaparayana = Kṛshṇa: XII, 1553. Lokapati = Brahmán : I, 3593 (Prajāpatiķ). [Mahāprasthānikaparvan] ("the section relating to the great journey to the other world," the 17th of the great and the 99th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Mahaprasthānika(m) parva(n)).—§ 794 : Janamejaya said : Having heard of the battle with iron clubs between the Vrshnis and Andhakas, and of Krshna's ascension to heaven, what did the Pandavas do? Vaiçampayana said: Having heard the particulars of the great slaughter of the Vrshnis, Yudhishthira set his heart on leaving the world, saying to his brothers that it is Time that ripens every creature, of which they approved. He made the kingdom over to Yuyutsu and installed Parikshit as king in Hastinapura, while Vajre ruled in Indraprastha. Then he offered oblations of water to Krehna, Rama, and Vasudova, etc., and craddhas to his deceased kinsmen, and fed Vydea, Narada, Markandeya, and Yajñavalkya, and gave jewels, etc. (specification) to brahmans in honour of Krshna. Krpa was installed as the preceptor of Parikehit. Then he summoned his subjects and informed them of his intentions: they tried in vain to dissuade him. He and his brothers and Draupadi removed their ornaments and wore barks of trees; then they threw their sacred fires into the water. Then they set out on their journey: the five Pandavas, Draupadi, and a dog. Krps, etc., stood around Yuyutsu; Ulupi entered the waters of Ganga; Citrangada set out for Manipura; the grandmothers of Parikshit surrounded him. Yudhishthira, ctc., set out with their faces turned towards the east, devoting themselves to yoga, resolved to observe the religion of renunciation; Yudhishthira first, then the other Pandavas in the order of their birth, behind them all Draupadi; a dog followed them. They reached the sea of red water. Agni came, and mentioning the Khandava forest, etc. (a), he caused Arjuna to throw the Gandina and his inexhaustible quivers into the water to be given back to Varuna. Then Agni disappeared. They now proceeded towards the south; then, by the northern coast of the salt sea, to the south-west; then towards the west, where they saw Dodraka covered by the occan; then to the north, observant of yoga, desirous of making a round of the whole carth (XVII, 1). They crossed Himarat, and behold a vast desert of sand, and then Meru. Krehnd dropped down; asked by Bhimasena, Yudhishthira said that this was the consequence of her partiality for Arjuna. Then Sahadeva fell down; asked by Bhimasena, Yudhishthira said it was because he never thought anybody his equal in wisdom. They went on. Nakula fell; asked by Bhimasena, Yudhishthira said it was because he thought that nobody equalled him in beauty, though his rightcousness was without blemish. Arjuna fell down; asked by Bhimasena, Yudhishthira said that it was because Arjuna had said that he would consume all the foes in a single day, but did not accomplish it. Bhimasena fell down: Yudhishthira told him it was because he was a great eater, and used to boast of his strength. Yudhishthira went on with the dog (XVII, 2). Indra came with a chariot, and asked Yudhishthira to ascend it for going to Heaven: Yudhishthira wanted to take Draupadi and his fallen brothers with him; Indra said they have already reached Heaven, where he will see them; Yudhishthira would have the dog to accompany him; † as Indra said there is no place in Heaven for persons with dogs, as the Krodhavaças take away all the merits of such persons, Yudhishthira refused to ascend the chariot. Then [the dog, transformed into] Dharma, said to Yudhishthira (†vv. 80-9) that he had formerly tested him in the Dvaitavana, where he had chosen the revival of Nakula, disregarding Bhimasena and Arjuna, for doing good to his [step]mother; "there is no one in Heaven that is equal to thee." Then Dharma, Indra, M., A., D., D.-r., causing Yudhishthira to ascend the chariot, proceeded to Heaven on their respective chariots. Narada said that Yudhishthira was superior to all the R.-r. there. Yudhishthira wished to proceed to where his brothers were: Indra, saving that his brothers had won regions of felicity, tried to persuade him to stay, beholding D.-r. and Si.; Yudhishthira wished to be united with his brothers and Draupadi (XVII, 3).

Maitreya' = Sūrya: III, 157.

Maitreya-bhikshal ("the alms of Maitreya"). § 7638 (Anuçasanik.): Bhishma said: Once Vyasa, while wandering in disguise, waited at Varanasi upon Maitreya in the house of a loose woman (evairin kule; so BR.; quite otherwise Nil. and PCR.), and was fed by him with excellent food. As he smiled, Maitreys said that he did not see much difference between one that behaved as an ordinary person [such as Vyasa] [and himself], [or generally] between one who is unemancipated and one who is emancipated, especially when [the latter, such as Maitreya] was distinguished by birth (pṛ/hag ācaratas tāta pṛthagātmasukhātmanoḥ) alpāntaram aham manye, viçiehtam api canvayat; cf. Nil. and PCR.). Vydes said that he wondered that the Vedas should [seemingly] contain an untruth; for even a small gift (as, for instance, a little water given to a thirsty man) produces great results, and Maitreya had, by feeding Vyasa, conquered many high regions of felicity, as one does [according to the Vedue, only] by great sacrifices. Gift is more auspicious than all sacred acts (XIII, 120). Maitreya, approving of the words of Vydea, praised the brahmans as the root of righteousness: "if the brahman be gratified, D. and P. also are gratified," referring to R. (XIII, 121). Vydea, saying that even the most atrocious sins are washed off by (gifts and) penances, recommended to him the duties of householders (XIII. 123).

[Maitreya-çapa(h)] ("the curse of Maitreya"). § 315 (Aranyak.). Vydea said that the rehi Maitreya would admonish Duryodhana. Maitreya came, having on a tirthayatra arrived at Kurujangala, and having visited Yudhishthire in the Kamyaka wood. As Maitreya advised Duryodhana to make peace with the Pandavas now that Bhims had slain Kirmira, etc., Duruodhana gave him a slight by slapping his thigh and scratching the ground with his foot. Therefore Mastroya cursed him, saying that Bhims should smash that thigh of his with his mace; this curse, however, should not take effect if he made peace with the Pandavas. Dhytarashira wished to hear about the death of Kirmira, but Maitreys would not speak again to him, because his words were not regarded by Duryothana; saying that Vidura would relate it to him, he went away. Duryedhana went out perturbed. (III, 10.)

[Mändhätrupäkhyäna(m)] (episode relating to Mandhatr.) (cf. Mandhatuh . . . upakhyanam, I, 446).- § 407 (Tirthay.): Questioned by Yudhishthira, Lomaça said: King (rajarshi, v. 10429) Yuvanüçva Saudyumni, of Ikshraku's race, performed besides other sacrifices 1,000 horse-sacrifices. As he had no sons, he made over the duties of the state to his ministers, and retired to the woods. Having once observed a fast, he entered the hermitage of Bhrgu, while the great rshis were asleep, and drank a jar of water, which the son of Bhrgu (maharshik), after having performed severe austerities, had destined to be drunk by Yuvanāçva's queen in order that she should bear him a son, who by his bravery might send even Indra to the abode of Yama. A sacrifice was then performed for him; after 100 years a son pierced Yuvanaçua's left side (nor did Yuvanaçva die). Indra came, and put the boy's forefinger into his mouth, saying "me he shall suck" (mam ayam dhasyati, whence the boy was called Mandhatr). Thereby Mandhatr became very strong, and grew 13 cubits (kishkan), and acquired the whole of the Vedas including the Dhanurveds by his thought alone, and on the same day he obtained the bow Ajagava and a number of shafts made of horn, and an impenetrable coat of mail. He was placed on the throne by Indra himself, and conquered the three worlds in a righteous way; the gems of their own accord came into his possession, and he performed a number of sacrifices with abundant gratuities, and sat at Indra's side. His sacrificial grounds (caityaih) were to be found all over the earth, and he is said to have given away to the Brahmans 10,000 padmas of kine. After twelve years' drought he caused rain to come down. paying no heed to Indra. He slew the Gandhara king of the lunar dynasty. Here, in the midst of Kurukshetra, is the spot where he sacrificed to the gods (III, 126).

Mankanaka, a rshi. § 365 (cf. Tirthayatrap.): At the tirtha Saptaearasvata the great rehi M. became perfect (siddhah), so that when he had cut his hand with the pointed blade of a kuça grass, there flew from his wound vegetable juice, at which he began to dance, and the animate and inanimate creation also began to dance together with him. Then the gods, headed by Brahman and the rshis, asked Mahadevs (i.e. Qiva) to prevent him from dancing. The god then in the presence of M. pressed his thumb with the tip of his own finger, and from the wound there came ashes, white as snow. Then M. became ashamed and adored Rudra, saying that he was the refuge of the world, including the gods and the Asuras, that he had created the three worlds, and swallows everything at the end of the yuga, that he cannot be fathomed by the gods themselves, that all the gods headed by Brahmán are to be seen in him, etc. At his request Civa said to the Brahmarshi that his asceticism (tapas) should through the grace of Cive increase a thousandfold, that he would dwell with him in the acrama, and that those who bathe in Saptasarasvata and worship Civa should be able to obtain everything here and hereafter, and go to the Sarasvata loka; then Mahadeva disappeared: III, 83, 6086 .- 615 (Baladevatirthayatra): IX, 37, 2185 (siddhah . . . mahamunih, had performed austerities at Saptasarasvata); 38, 2186 .--§ 615j (do.): M. had from his youth led the life of a brahmaedris. Once, when performing his ablutions in the river Sarasvati, he beheld a woman bathing in the river; at this sight his seed dropped and fell into the Sersevas; he took it up and placed it in his earthen pot; then it became divided into seven parts, whence were born seven rehis: Payuvega, fetc. (8), who were the progenitors of the Marute. [Manushyagrahakathana(m)] ("on the demons that possess mankind"). § 502 (cf. Skandop.). The six divorced wives of the rehis, together with Vinata, obtained permission from Skanda to become his mothers. At the request of Indra the Krttikas (i.e. the six wives of the rehis) (together with Vinata, see v. 14464 and Nil.) are placed among the nakshatras (and presided over by Agni) instead of Abhijit, the younger sister of Robins, who from jealousy had repaired to the woods. Brahman ordered that time should be reckoned from Dhanishtha, while it had formerly been reckoued from Rohini (so Nil.). Then (these seven) mothers asked Skanda that they might become the mothers of the worlds instead of the old mothers (Brahmi, Maheçvari, etc.; Nil.) and devour the progeny of those old mothers, because they had slandered them before their husbands, and always dwell with Skanda. Skanda granted that until the age of 16 years they should have the power of afflicting the human kind, and he loosed from his body his Raudra nature, under the name of Skandapasmara, that they might dwell with him. Enumeration of several grahas (the number 18 in v. 14490 is difficult to explain), among others (a) the male and female children of Skanda (the males are the husbands of the females); they are all named Skandagrahas; they are propitiated with offerings, ablutions, unguents, etc., and particularly by the worship of Skanda; and when they are propitiated they bestow good on men. Then are mentioned the grahae, that afflict men from the 16th to the 70th year; after the 70th year fever takes the place of the grahae. These evil spirits always avoid those who have subdued their senses, etc., and those who are devoted to Makequere (III, 230).

On the branches lived a cut Lomaça. A Candals came and built a hut, setting his traps of leather strings every evening after sunset. One day he caught the cat. Palits began to eat the flesh in the trap, but beheld the mongoces Harik and the owl Candraka. He resolved upon saving the cat, though an enemy, in order to escape from them; having made peace with the cat, he crouched beneath it; the mongoose and owl left the spot; the mouse began to cut the strings slowly, notwithstanding the cat's impatience. At morning the Candala Parigha appeared (description), accompanied by a pack of dogs. Then the mouse quickly cut the remaining string; the cat got upon the banyan, Palite entered his hole. The hunter took up his net and left the spot. Palita would not conclude friendship with the cat, and entered another hole.

[Märkandeyasamäsyäparvan(°va)]("section relating to the [Pandavas'] enjoying the company of Markandeya," the 41st of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.). (Cf. Markandeyasamāsyā.) § 451: When the Pandavas were dwelling at that very place (cf. v. 12547: caratām marudhanvasu, "roaming about in deserts"), there set in the season of the rains (description). Then in the autumn (description) they spent the holiest night, that of the full moon in the month of Kartlika, on the Sarasvati with the ascetics. As soon as the dark fortnight set in, they with their charioteers and cooks entered the Kamyaka forest (III, 182).—§ 452: In the Kamyaka wood many brahmens came to them, and one of them said that Krshna and Markandeya would come to see them. Immediately Krokas arrived with Salyabhama on his chariot that was yoked with Caibys and Sugrices. He told Krahad that her sons, though her father and brothers proffered them a kingdom and territories, found no joy in the house of Drupads, but that in the town of the Vreises they were directed by Subhadra and received instruction from Rankmineya even as Aniruddha, Abhimanyu, Sunitha, and Bhanu, and were instructed by the young Abhimanys in the use of arms. Then he suggested to Yudhichfhirs with the Dagarhas, Kukuras, and Andhakas, to kill Duryedhana, etc. Yudhishfhira said they would stand by their promise, and after the thirteen years take refuge in

Krehna .- § 458: While they were thus talking, the brahmarshi Markandeys (b) appeared. When they had taken their seats. the devarshi Narada also came to visit them. Yudhishthira, mentioning the happiness of the impious Dhartarashtras, asked Markandeya about the results of men's acts. Markandoys, after having described the Kris age and the subsequent deterioration, answered the question (III, 183).—§§ 454-5: Brahmanamahatmya - kathana (q.v.). — § 456 : Saravoli-Türkehya-samoāda (q.v.).—§ 457 : Vairasvatopākhyāna (q.v.). -\$ 458 : Yudhishthira, saying that Markandeya alone worships Brahman at the time of the great dissolution, when he sleeps in a lotus flower, and when he awakes to recreate the world, asked him to explain the causes of things. Markandeya said: Janardana attired in yellow robes is the great creator of everything. After the dissolution, creation again comes to life. Kria yuga = 4,000 years + dawn 400 years + eve 400 years : Treta yuga = 3,000 + 300 + 300; Dvapara yuga = 2,000+200+200; Kali yuga = 1,000 + 100 + 100; altogether a cycle of yugas = 12,000 years. After the Kali yuga is over, the Krta yuga comes again. One thousand cycles constitute a day of Brahmán. Description of Kali yuga (b). Then comes a long drought, and seven suns drink up all water and reduce wood and grass to ashes. Then the Samvartaks fire with wind penetrates into Rasatala and terrifles the gods. Danavas, and Yakshas, and consumes this world with gods, Asuras, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Uragas, and Rakshasas. And there rise in the sky deep masses of clouds flooding the entire surface of the earth and showering incessantly for twelve years. Then Sveyembha, dwelling in the lotus, drinks this terrible wind and goes to sleep. - § 459: When all has become water, I (i.e. Markandeya) alone wander in affliction and become fatigued, and find no resting-place. Then I behold a vast banyan-tree, and on a couch attached to a bough of that tree a fair boy with yellow robes, with the mark of Crivatea. He caused me to enter his body through the mouth, and then I beheld the whole earth with cities and kingdoms, Ganga, Catadru, etc. (enumeration) (a), gods, Sadhyas, Rudras, Adityce, etc. (enumeration)  $(\beta)$ . At last I was suddenly projected through his open mouth by a gust of wind. Within that very moment I acquired a new sight and beheld myself emancipated (nirmuktam). I wished to know his self. Then he spoke to me (III, 188): "The gods even do not know me truly. I am Narayana (v. 12952: "in ancient times I called the waters nard, and because the waters have ever been my sysns [home], therefore I have been called Narayans"), the eternal and unchangeable source of all things, the Creator and Destroyer of all; I am Vielnu, Brahmán, Cakra, etc.; in the form of Cooks I support this earth, in the form of a boar I raised it when sunk in water; I am the Vadavavaktra fire; from my mouth, arms, thighs, and feet sprang brahmans, kehatriyas, vaiçyas, and çadras; from me spring the Rg.-, Same-, Yajur-, and Atherva-veda; I am the Sameartake fire, the Samvartaka wind, the Samvartaka cun, and the Samvartaka fire (!) (v. 12966 foll.); the stars are the pores of my skin, etc. When virtue and morality decrease, I create myself into new forms; in the Krts age I become white, etc. (see \$\$ 4263, 427, 428, 429). When the end comes, I alone in the form of Kala destroy the three worlds, etc. The grandsire of all creatures (Sarvalokapitamaha) is half of my body. I am the bearer of the conch-shell, the discus, and the mace. For a period of 1,000 cycles of yugas I aleep, overwhelming all creatures in insensibility, and I stay here, in the form of a boy though I am old, until Brahman wakes up; under the form of Brahman I have repeatedly granted thee boons When Brokman (Sarvelokapitamaha) awakes, I will ther alone create all creatures." Then he disappeared, and I (Markandeys) beheld this creation start into life. And that deity is Kreans, thy relative. In consequence of the boon granted by him memory does not fail me, my life is long, and death is under my control (v. 13002). Then all bowed down unto Janardana (i.e. Krehna), who comforted them (III, 189).- 460: Yudhishthira asked him about the future cause of the government (samrajya) of the earth. Markandeya, having given a short description of the other yugas, described in detail the Kali-yuga (b); "in the new Krta-yuga, Kalkin (c) will arise." Then Markandeya gave Yudhishthira some moral precepts and exhortations (III, 190-1).- § 461: Vamadevacarita (q.v.).—§ 462: Baka-Çakra-samvāda (q.v.). § 463 : Cibi (q.v.) .- § 464 : Nahusha-carita (v. Yayati) .-§ 465, on the same topic: There were two learned and able kings, Vrehadarbha and Seduka. Seduka know that Vrehadarbha had from his boyhood an unuttered vow, that he would give no other metal to brahmans than gold and silver. He once sent a brahman, who asked him for 1,000 horses for his preceptor, to Vrshadarbha, who whipped him and then gave him a day's tribute (which was more than the value of 1,000 horses), "because he had whipped him" (III, 196). -- § 466 : Cibi (q.v.). -- § 467 : Rājanyamahābhāgya (q.v.).--§ 468: Indradyumnopākhyāna (q.v.).—§ 469: Asked by Yudhishthira in what condition (age) a man should practise charity, Markandeya enumerated four kinds of futile life and sixteen kinds of futile charity. The brahmans save others and themselves by japa, mantra, and home. He next enumerated the brahmans that should be excluded from graddhas, and gave other moral precepts (of offerings to the gods of flowers and sanduls and pastes, entertainment of guests); then he enumerated the persons to whom one should make gifts; the effects of various gifts to brahmans (food is the best).— § 470: Yamaloka (q.v.).—§ 471: Precepts about gifts, washing the feet of brahmans, etc. Blessing upon the reader.-§ 472: Three kinds of purity (speech, deed, water): by adoring sandhyd and reciting Gayatri one is protected against sin and evil results from gifts, against inauspicious stars, and against Rakehasas. Greatness of the brahmans. The carrying of three staves, etc., are useless if the heart be not pure. They who do not commit sin in manas, word, deed, and buddhi do really practise austerities (v. 13468: by tapas one may attain Svarge, by charity enjoyment, by knowledge salvation (mokehs), by bathing in tirthas purgation from sine) .-§ 473: On the effects of various gifts at various times (v. 13480: the first offspring of fire is gold, earth springs from Vishan, and the cows from the sun; he, therefore, that gives away gold, land, and kine, has given the three worlds [of Agni, Vishes, and the Sun]) (III, 200).—§ 474: Having heard the history of Indradyumna, Yudhishfhira, saying that Markandeys knew the gods, Danavas, Rakshasas, the royal genealogies and the genealogies of the rekis, and Gandharvas, Yakshas, Kinnaras, and Apearasse, asked him about Kwalāçva Ikshvāku. Mātalīya, adj. ("relating to Mātali"). § 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 331 ("am upākhyānam. i.e. Mātalīyopākhyāna).

[Mātalīyopākhyāna(m)] (" the episode relating to Mātali"). (Cf. Mātalīyam upākhyānam.) § 564 (Bhagavady.). The holy Rehi (bhagavān rehih) Kanva said to Duryodhana in the assembly of the Kurus: Brahmán, the grandsire of the universe (Lokapitamahah), is indestructible and eternal. The holy Rehis (bhagavantāv rehī) Nara and Narayana are of the same character. Of all the sons of Aditi, Vishņu alone is eternal . . . In this connection is cited an old story: Matali, the charioteer of Indra, had, by his wife Sudharma, one beautiful daughter, Gunakeçi. As he found no suitable husband for her amongst D., Dai., G., or men and R., Matali set out for the Nagaloka (V, 97). On the way Narada, proceeding to visit Varuna, followed Matali, and first showed him the abode of Varuna, surrounded by his sons and grandsons. Varuna's son Pushkara had been chosen as husband by Soma's daughter Jyotsnakali (who had [before] chosen (so PCR.) the eldest and foremost of Aditi's sons (i.e. Surva, Nil.)). He then showed him the abode, entirely made of gold, of the liquor (Varunyam): to the possession of that liquor (surā) the gods owe their being Surāh. He showed him also the weapons that had belonged to the Daityas and had been obtained by the gods as a booty of war; when hurled at the foe they always return into the hand that hurls them. Here dwelt in days of yore many tribes of Ra. and Dai. Here is that fire of blazing flames and the discus of Vishnu; and that knotty bow that was created for the destruction of the world; it is always protected with great vigilance by the gods, and it is from this bow that the one wielded by Arjuna has taken its name; it is endued with the strength of 100,000 bows; it punishes all wicked (rakshobandhushu) kings; it was first created by Brahmán and praised by Cukra (B. Cakrona); it is held by the sons of the Lord of waters. He showed him also Varuna's umbrella in the umbrolla-house, always dropping water that cannot be seen. Innumerable are the wonders to be seen here (V, 98). In the very centre of the Nagaloka is the city Patala with Daityas and Danavas, the Asura fire, fed by water; here the gods, having first vanquished their foes, quaffed the amrta and deposited the residue; the Aditya Hayaçiras; from here Airavata takes up water in order to impart it to the clouds, and it is that water which Indra pours down as rain; aquatic animals, the timi, etc., which subsist on the rays of the moon; here Mahadeva practised ascetic austerities for the benefit of all creatures; maharshis addicted to the vow of go (govratinah); here in the race of the celebrated elephant Supratika were born the elephants Airāvaņa (the king of his tribe), Vāmana, Kumuda, and Anjana; an egg in the waters from the commencement of the creation, whonce, when the end of the world comes, a fire bursts forth and consumes the three worlds, etc. Matali said: "No one here seems to be eligible" (V, 99). In Patala is Hiranyapura, built by the Danava (so PCR.; B. and C. Viçvakarmana) Maya. belonging to the Daityas and Danavas, who in days of yore lived here having obtained boons, exhibiting 1,000 different kinds of illusion, incapable of being vanquished by Cakra, Yama, Varuna, or Kubera, etc. The Kalakhanjas (Asuras, who sprang from Vishņu (?), so PCR. : Asurāh Kālakhañjāc ca tathā Vishnupadodbhavāh; C. Kālakao) and the Yātudhānas (Rākshasas, who sprang from the feet of Brahmán (?), so PCR. : Nairrta Yatudhanac ca Brahmapadodbhavac ca ye) (description); the Nivatakavacas (Danavas); "many times, 473 Matanga-Mati.

O Matali! thou with thy son Gomukha and Indra hadst to retreat before them"; description of their abodes (the gems arkasphatika, vajrasāra, padmarāga, etc.). Mātali would not choose a son-in-law among the Danavas, the enemies of the gods; "as regards thyself (i.e. Nārada), I know that thy heart is ever set on fomenting quarrels (himsatmakam)" (V, 100). Then the world of the Suparnas, who subsist on snakes and have sprung from the six sons of Garuda: Sumukha, etc. (a), of Kaçyapa's and Vinata's race, adorned with the Crivatsa, belonging to the kshatriya order, for they never attain to brahmanhood (brahmanyam) in consequence of their preying upon their kinsmen; they are shown favour by Vishnu, and adore Vishnu. The names of the principal are: Suvarņacūda, etc. ( $\beta$ ) (V, 101). Rasātala is the seventh stratum below the earth; here dwells Surabhi, the mother of kine, born of the amrta; her milk springs from the essence of the six different kinds of tastes; she sprang of old from the mouth of Brahmán, who was gratified with drinking the ampta and vomited the best of things (i.e. the cow and the brahman, PCR.). A jet of her milk created the Milky Ocean (kshīranidhi), covered with white foam that is the food of the ascetics (munisattamah) Phenapah (" Foamdrinkers"); the very gods fear them because of their austerities. From Surabhi are born the four kine that support the quarters (diçum pālyah): in the East Surupā, in the South Hamsikā, in the West Subhadrā, in the North (dharmyām Ailavilazañjñitām) Sarvakāmadughā. The gods and the Asuras, making Mandara their pole, churned the Ocean, and obtained Varuni, Lakshmi, amrta, Uccaihcravas, and Kaustubha. Surabhī milks sudhā to those who live on sudhā (i.e. the Nägus, PCR.), svadhā to those who live on svadhā (i.e. the Pitrs, PCR.), and amrta to those who live on amrta (i.e. the gods, PCR.). The gatha that was sung by the dwellers of Rasatula in days of old is still heard to be recited in the world by persons of learning: "Neither in the Nāga-loka, nor in Svarga, nor in a vimāna, nor in heaven (Tripishtaps) is residence so happy as in Rasatala" (V. 102). The city of Bhogavatī resembles Indra's city Amarāratī; it is ruled over by Vāsuki, the king of the Nagas; here dwells Cosha (b); here dwell the innumerable Nagas (description), the sons of Surasa, wearing svastika, etc. The principal are Vāsuki, etc. (7). Mātali wished to get for his son-in-law the Naga Sumukha of Airavata's race, the son of Cikura (who had been not long before slain by Garuda), and the grandson of Aryaka Kauravya and the daughter's son of Vāmana (V, 103). Nārada introduced Mūtali to Āryaka as the friend and charioteer of Indra, who drives his chariot drawn by 1,000 steeds, and thereby has vanquished the enemies of the gods. Aryaka objected that Garuda, who had slain Cikura, when he left these regions had said that after a month he would devour Sumukha also. According to a proposal of Matali, they all visited Indra and Vishnu; Vishņu proposed to give amrta to Sumukha; but Indra disagreed on account of the prowess of Garuda; instead he gave him an excellent lease of life, and having married Matali's daughter he returned home (V, 104). made remonstrances to Indra, saying that he, like him, can without any fatigue bear the weight of the three worlds; that he had slain the Daityas Crutaçri, etc. ( $\delta$ ); that he not only perches on Vishnu's flagstuff, but sometimes carries him with all his friends on his back, and he can carry Vishnu without fatigue on only one of his feathers. Vishnu shows him that he cannot bear the weight of his one right arm;

then he threw Sumukha with the toe of his foot upon Garuda's breast. And from that time Garuda has ever lived (in friendship?) with that snake. Kanva continued: "In the same way, O Duryodhana! thou canst note neounter Bhima, etc. (a)." Duryodhana, fixing his eyes on Karna, burst into laughter, saying: "I am precisely what the creator has made me" (V, 105).

Matsa (IV, 145), v. Matsya 2.

Matsya', a king, son of Vasu Uparicara. § 76 (cf. Adivamçãvatārana): When Girikā's season came, the pitrs of Vasu (q.v.) asked him to slay deer; when he in the forest was longing for Girika, he gave his semen, enveloped by an açoka leaf, to a hawk in order that it should be carried to Girika; persecuted by another hawk, the hawk let the semen full into the Yamund, where it was swallowed by the Apsaras Adrika, who had by the curse of a brahman been transformed into a fish. In the tenth month the fish was caught, and out of its womb came a boy, who was given to Uparicara and afterwards became the king Matsya, and a girl, Satyavati, who was of a fishy smell, and was retained by the fisherman. When killed, Adrikā assumed her own celestial shape and went away to the regions of the Siddhas, the Rshis, and the Caranas: I, 63, 2393 (raja). § 267 (Yamasebhav.): II, 8, 320 (in the palace of Yama).

[Mausalaparvan] ("the section relating to the battle with clubs," the 16th of the great and the 98th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Mausala). § 793: Vaicampāyana said: When the 36th year [after the great battle] was reached, Yudhishthira beheld many unusual portents (specification). A little while afterwards he heard of the wholesale carnage of the Vrehnis in a battle with clubs, where only Krshna and Rama had escaped with life; he summoned his brothers and took counsel with them; they were filled with grief; the death of Krehna they could not believe. Janamejaya inquired alout the particulars of the destruction of the Vrshnie and Andhakas. Vaicampayana said: \*\* When the 36th year . . . (cf. above). Asked by Janamejaya, cursed by whom the Vrahnis, etc. (a), met with destruction. Vaicampayana said : Sarana, etc., saw Viçvamıtra, Kanva, and Narada arrived at Doaraka; they disguised Camba as a woman, calling her the wife of Babhru, and asked the ascetics what [sort of child] this one would bring forth. The ascetics answered: "This Camba will bring forth a terrible iron club for the destruction of the Vrshnis and Andhakas, except Rama (who will enter the ocean) and Krinna (whom Jara will pierce while lying on the ground)." Then they went to Krshna. Informed of what had taken place, Krshna summoned all the Vrshnis and told them of it, but did not try to annul the curse. The next day Camba actually brought forth an iron club. The fact was reported to the king [ Ugrasena], who caused it to be reduced into powder and thrown into the sea. At the command of Ahuka, etc.  $(\beta)$ , the manufacture of spirits was forbidden among all the Vrehnie and Andhakae, under the penance of being impaled alive with all one's kinsmen. All the citizens (knowing that it was the command of Rama also) bound themselves by the rule (XVI, 1). [The embodied form of] Time every day wandered about their houses, like a man of terrible and fierce aspect, bald head, black and tawny of complexion; they shot innumerable arrows at him, without being able to pierce him. Also other dreadful portents of calamity were daily seen by the Frehnis throughout the city (description). They showed disregard for brahmans, P., and D., etc., except Rama and Krshna, etc. When the Pañoajanya was blown in their houses, asses brayed aloud from every direction. Krshna, seeing that the day of the new moon coincided with the 13th [and 14th] lunation, summoned the Yadavas and said: The 14th lunation has been made the 15th by Rahu once more, as at the time of the great battle [Mausalaparvan.] 476 of the Bharatas (v. the note of PCR, on p. 5). He understood that the 36th year had come according to the curse of Gandhari, and that the omens were similar to those which Yudhishthira had noticed when the two armies were arrayed in order of battle. He endeavoured to bring about those occurrences which would make Gandhart's words true. He commanded the Vrshnis to make a pilgrimage to some sacred water, and caused the messengers to proclaim a journey to the sea-coast (XVI, 2). At that time the Vrshni ladies dreamt every night that a black woman with white teeth, entering their abodes, laughed aloud and ran through Douraka stealing [from them]; the men dreamt of vultures that devoured the Vrshnis and Andhakas in the houses and firechambers; their ornaments, etc., were taken away by Ra. The iron discus of Krshna, given by Agni, with a nave of adamant, ascended to heaven. Krehna's chariot was dragged away by his four steeds over the ocean; Krshna's and Baladeva's standards (resp. Garuda and a palmyra), which were reverently worshipped by those two heroes, were taken away by Aps., who day and night called upon the Vrshnis and Andhakas to set out on a pilgrimage to some sacred water. They prepared various kinds of edibles and spirits, and set out to Prabhasa. Uddhava took leave of them and Krshna before departing [from the world]. The Vrehnis, mixing with spirits the food that had been cooked for the brahmans, gave it to apes, and began revels with drinking, so also Rama, etc. (7); Yuyudhana blamed Krtavarman for the nightly slaughter, and was applauded by Pradyumna, but was rebuked by Krtavarman with having killed Bhuricravas while sitting in praya; Krehna cast an angry glance [at Krtavarman], and Satyaki informed him of the story of the gem Syamantaka, which was Satrajit's; Satyabhama, weeping, approached Krshna, and sitting on his lap enhanced his anger; Satyaki swore that he would cause Krtavarman to follow the five sons of Draupadi, etc. (8), whom he had slain with the help of Acvatthaman, and he severed his head in the very sight of Krehna and began to strike down others; Krshna rushed forward to prevent him from doing further mischief, and the Bhojas and Andhakas all assailed him; Krshna did not interfere; they struck Yuyudhana with the pots from which they had been eating; Pradyumna rushed forward to rescue Yuyudhana; they were both slain. Krshna in wrath took up a handful of eraka grass, which became a terrible iron club, with which Krohna slew all that came before him. The Andhakas, etc. (e), also took up blades of the erakā grass, which were converted into iron clubs, and struck one another in consequence of the curse of the brahmans; son killed father and vice versa, inebriated with spirits. Beholding that Camba, etc. (ζ), were slain, Krehna exterminated the Vrshnis and the Andhakas. Babhru and Daruka told him now to go to Rama (XVI, 3). Daruka, Krehna, and Babhru, seeking Rama, saw him sitting thoughtfully, reclining his back against a tree. Krshna sent Daruka to inform Arjuna and tell him to come quickly, and he also dispatched Babhru to protect the ladies against robbers; but as soon as Babhru had proceeded to a distance, an iron club attached to the mallet of a hunter came and slew him Krshna then, entering Dvaravati, told his father to protect the ladies till Arjung came, saving that he would practise penances with Rama. When he came to Rama, the latter had applied himself to yoga, and from his mouth issued a huge white Naga with 1,000 heads and red eyes, who proceeded to the ocean, and was received by the ocean and many celestial enakes (and many sacred rivers): Kerkejaka, etc. (7). After Rama's death Krehna wandered for some time, and then sat down, thinking of Gandhari (§ 619) and Durvasas (§ 7730), and the destruction of the Vrshnis, Andhakas, and Kurus, whence he concluded that the hour [of his death] had come; he then restrained his senses [in yoga]; though he was the Supreme Deity, he wished to die in order to dispel all doubts, etc., and to make the words of Durvasas true. The hunter Jara, mistaking Krshna for a deer, pierced him at the heel with an arrow; coming up, he beheld a man dressed in yellow robes, rapt in yoga, with many arms; he became filled with fear; Krehna comforted him and then ascended upwards, and was received in heaven by Indra, etc.  $(\theta)$ (XVI, 4). Meanwhile Daruka came and informed the Pandavas of the slaughter of the Vrehnis, etc. (1). Ariuna with Daruka proceeded to Dvaraka; when Krehna's 16,000 wives saw Arjuna, they uttored a loud cry; the city seemed to Arjuna to be the fierce river Vaitarant; Arjuna, Satya (the daughter of Satrajit), and Ruhmini fell down and wailed; then praising Krehna and comforting the ladies, Arjuna went to Vasudeva (XVI, 5), whom he found lying on the ground and burning with grief; Vasudeva lamented (x) and said he would die by abstaining from food (XVI, 6). Arjuna said that the hour had come for the Pandavas also for departing [from the world] ( $\lambda$ ); he would, however, first remove to Indraprastha the women, the children, and the aged of the Vrshnis. Saying to Daruka that he wished to see the chief officers of the Vrehnie, Arjuna entered the hall of the Yādavas called Sudharmā, where he said to the citizens and ministers that he would take away with him the remnants of the Vrshnis and Andhakas, as the sea would soon engulf the city; Vajra would be their king at Indraprastha; they would set out on the seventh day at sunrise. Arjuna passed that night in the mansion of Krehna. At dawn Vasudeva by yoga attained to the highest goal; the ladies were in despair. His four wives, Devaki, Bhadra, Rohini, and Madira, ascended the funeral pyre, and attained to the regions of Vasudeva. When Ariung had caused Vasudeva and his four wives to be burnt (under immense tokens of sympathy from the women), the boys (headed by Vajra) and the ladies offered oblations of water to Vasudeva. Then Arjuna visited the spot where the Vrshnis had been killed and caused the last rites to be performed, and caused Rama and Krshna to be cremated. On the seventh day he set out, mounting his chariot, with the ladies and children, the Yadava troops, and other inhabitants, with Krshna's 16,000 wives and Vajra; they numbered many millions in all. Then the ocean flooded Dvaraka. They proceeded in slow marches. When they had planted their encampment at Pancanada, the Abhiras (Miscohas) conspired to rob the cavalcade. Arjuna succeeded only with great difficulty in stringing his bow; his celestial weapons would not come to his mind; the Vrshni warriors failed to rescue the women, who were snatched away by the robbers; Arjuna's shafts soon became exhausted; formerly they had been inexhaustible. Arjuna became very cheerless; he escorted the remnant of the cavalcade to Kurukshetra; he established the son of Krtavarman in the city of Marttikavata with the remnant of the women of the Bhoja king; the remainder, with children and old men and women, at Indraprastha, with Vajra as their ruler; the son of Yuyudhana (with old men, etc.) on the banks of the Saraevati; the widows of Akrara, notwithstanding the entreaties of Vajra, entered the woods; Rubmini, etc. (µ), ascended the funeral pyre; Satyabhama and the other wives of Krehna entered the woods in order to practise penances in the contemplation of Heri: going beyond Himavat, they took up their abode in Kalana-orama. Then Arjuna entered the retreat of Vyasa (XVI, 7). Asked by Vyasa ("Hast thou been sprinkled with water from anybody's nails or hair, etc. ?"), Arjuna informed him of what had passed (v) (" 500,000 warriors have thus been laid down"). Fydea said that the Frehnis and Andhakas had been consumed by the brahman's curse; it was destiny: "Krehna, as also the Pandavas, have finished their work; the time has come for your departure from the world," etc.  $(\xi)$ . Arjuna entered Hastinapura and informed Yudhishthira of what had taken place (XVI, 8).

[Mokshadharmaparvan] ("the section containing the rule for attaining to emancipation from transmigration," the 90th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Mokshadharma). § 659: Yudhishthira inquired about the duties in the four stages of life; Bhishma indicated the attainment of emancipation as the highest of all duties. Yudhishthira asked Bhīshma how grief might be overcome; Bhīshma related the old story of the conversation between a brahman and king Senajit, burning with sorrow on account of the death of his son; dissociation from the world is the grand method of overcoming grief. The brahman cited the verses sung by Pingala (a fallen woman who was denied the company of her lover through an accident) about the manner in which she had acquired eternal merit; freedom from hope and desire is felicity. King Senajet experienced delight and became very happy (XII, 174). Yudhishthira inquired of Bhishma as to what constitutes the highest good that man should seek in view of the transient character of time; Bhishma related the old narrative of a discourse between a brahman, who was devoted to the study of the Vedas, and his son Medhavin, who was well conversant with the religion of emancipation, and acquainted also with the affairs of the world, on the uncertainty of life and the mutability of all things save Brahman (XII, 175). Yudhishthira asked how happiness and misery come to the rich and the poor; Bhishma related the old narrative of what was sung by Campāka, who had achieved emancipation, told in former times by a poor brahman rendered miserable by a bad wife, etc.; the faults of prosperity; in renunciation is the highest good of men (XII, 176). Yudhishthira asked what a man must do to find happiness if he be poor. Bhishma explained who is a happy man, and related the old narrative of what Manki had sung when freed from attachments; Manki found that he was assiduously doomed to disappointments; at last, with a remnant of his property, he purchased a couple of young bulls with a yoke; a camel ran away with them upon its neck; Manki's observations, quoting Cuka: desire is fraught with sorrow (XII, 177). In this connection reference is made to the old verses sung by the Videha king Janaka, who had attained to tranquillity of soul: "even if the whole of Mithila be consumed in a conflagration I shall incur no loss." Discourse between king Nanusha (i.e. Yayati) and R. Bodhya about freedom from attachment; Bodhya's six preceptors (Pingalā, etc.) (XII, 178). Yudhishthira wished to know by what conduct a person may succeed in this world and attain to an excellent end. Bhishms related the old story of the discourse between king Prahlada and a sage who had adopted the Ajagara vow: the indifference of the latter to all worldly objects in view of the inevitability of death (XII, 179). Yudhishthira asked which of these, viz. kinsmen, or acts, or wealth, or wisdom, should be the refuge of man. Bhishma answered that wisdom should be the refuge, instancing Bali, etc. (a), and related the old story of the discourse between Indra and Kaçyapa, a R.'s son, who was brought to the ground by a vaicya negligently driving his chariot, and who in despair resolved to end his life; Indra appeared to him in the form of a jackal and proved to him the superiority of his status as a human being and a brahman; not to yield to the instigation of the senses constitutes happiness; "thou dost not regret (smarass) wine (Varual) nor the latraka fowls; there is no drink and no food more delicious than these: . . . the vilest Pukkasa or Candals never wishes to give up his life." Kacyapa gave up the desire of ending his life; he knew the jackal to be Indra, worshipped him, and returned home (XII, 180). Yudhishthira asked whether gifts, sacrifices, penances, and dutiful services to preceptors are productive of merit. Bhīshma's discourse on righteousness and sin and their respective consequences on life (XII, 181).- § 660: Yudhishthira inquired about him who has created the universe and to whom it returns when dissolution comes. Bhishma related the old narrative of the sacred words that M.-r. Bhrgu uttered in reply to the questions of Bharadvaja, on the Kailasa summit, explaining to him the cosmogony, i.e. Bhrgu-Bharadvaja-samvada (b) (XII,182-192).- § 661: Yudhishthira asked Bhishma about the ordinances about conduct. Bhishma's discourse on the characteristics of the wicked and the good ("Surya should always be worshipped," etc.), and the duties that all men should practise, quoting D.-r. Nārada; "one who has abstained from meat should not take meat even if it be sanctified with mantras from the Yajurveda" (XII, 193). Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhīshma discoursed on adhyātma; the nature of the three attributes of Goodness, Passion, and Darkness; the distinction between matter (sattva) and soul (kshetrajña); the highest end to be obtained is emancipation (XII, 194). Bhishma discoursed on the four kinds of yoga; "M.-r., obtaining a knowledge of the same, attain to eternal success (siddhim) even here" (XII, 195). Yudhishthira inquired after the fruits of the silent recitation of sacred mantras; Bhishma wanted to recite the old narrative of the discourse between Yama, a brahman, and Time (v. infra, ch. 199); on Sankhya, "otherwise called the Vedania," and Yoga, Bruhman, etc. (XII, 196). Yudhishthira inquired about the other aims of silent reciters; Bhishma indicated the different aims realized by different kinds of reciters (XII, 197); the nature of the hell into which reciters may sink; the regions of Lp., etc. (a), are hells compared to the region of the Supreme Soul, i.e. to emancipation (XII, 198). - § 662: Yudhishthira wished to hear in full the dispute between Time, Mrtyu, Yama, Sūrya's son Ikshvāku, and a brahman, referred to above (v. ch. 196); Bhishma related this old story, i.e. Japakopākhyāna (b) (XII, 199-200).- § 663: Yudhishthira inquired about the results of the yoga of knowledge, of all the Vedas, and of observances and vows; Bhishma related the old discourse between Manu Prajapati and his disciple M.-r. Brhaspati (the foremost of D.-r.), in days of old, who had studied the Rcs, etc. (a); Brhaspati asked how an embodied being departs from one body and attains to another; acts result from the desire of obtaining happiness and avoiding misery; the efforts for the acquisition of knowledge arise from the desire of avoiding both happiness and misery; it is by avoiding acts that one succeeds in entering into Brahman; the nature of Brahman (XII, 201); continuation of Manu's discourse on the nature of emancipation and the soul; the soul takes its character from the body; how the soul leaving one body enters into another (XII, 202); though invisible, the soul exists (XII, 203); continuation of Manu's discourse, explaining how the soul may be seen (XII, 204); continuation of Manu's discourse, explaining how grief may be avoided; how Brahman may be attained (XII, 205); abstention from acts is the highest religion (XII, 206) .-§ 664: Yudhishthira asked Bhishma about the nature of the Supreme Deity (Vishnu, Narayana, etc. (a)). Bhishma's discourse, which he had heard from Rama Jamadagnya, etc. ( $\beta$ ), on the nature of Narayana or Govinda, etc. ( $\gamma$ ); the Asura Madhu (b); Brahmán's seven will-born sons (b). etc. (e). Madhusudana (Kṛshṇa) created day and night, etc. (5); then from his mouth he created 100 brahmans, from his arms 100 kshatriyas, from his thighs 100 vaicuas. and from his feet 100 çudras, and then he made Dhatr (i.e. Brahmán, PCR) the lord and ruler of all created beings; Brahman also became the expositor of the knowledge of the Vedas; Virupaksha he made the ruler of the spirits and ghosts and Matrs; Yama the ruler of P. [and] all sinful men; Kubera the lord of all treasures; Varuna the lord of the waters and of all aquatic animals; Indra the lord of the gods. In those times men lived as long as they chose, without any fear of Yama; offspring was begotten by a flat of the will. In the Treta age children were begotten by touch alone. In the Dvapara age sexual intercourse originated. In the Kah age men have come to marry and live in pairs. The sinful creatures of the earth, born in the southern region and called Andhrakas, etc.  $(\eta)$ ; in the northern region, the Yaunas, etc. ( $\theta$ ); their practices are similar to those of Candalas and ravens and vultures; in the Krta age they were nowhere on earth; it is from the Treta that they have had their origin; when the terrible interval [botween the Trota and the Drapara] came, the kshatriyas engaged in battle. D.-r. Narada, that observer of all the worlds, has said that Krshna is the supreme god (XII, 207).- § 665: Yudhishthira asked who are the first Prajapatis, and who the great Rshis, and in which direction they dwell. Bhishma enumerated Brahman's seven sons (a), mentioned in the Puranas as seven Brahmáns. The Prajāpatis that came after these are: (a) in Atri's race: Prācīnabarhis (Brahmayonih sanātanah) > the ten Prācētasah > Prajapati Daksha or Ka; (b) Marīci had one son Kaçyapa or Arishfanomi. Atri had another son born of his loins, the handsome and princely Soma; he performed penances for 1,000 celestial yugas. Aryaman and his sons were rulers and creators of all creatures. Caçabindu had 10,000 wives, and begot upon each of them 1,000 sons, who would call none Prajūpati save themselves; the ancient (purānāh) brahmans call creatures (prajam) Çaçabindavî; this race became the progenitor of the Vrshui race. "These that I have named are the illustrious Prajūpatis." The deities are: the twelve Adityas (all sprung from Kacyapa) (B); the Acrins ( $\gamma$ ) (the sons of Martanda—ashtamasya); these were first called the gods and the two classes of Pitrs (? te ca pūrram surāc ceti dvividhāh pitarah smrtāh). Tvashtr's son was the handsome Viçvarūpa; Ajaikapād, etc. (δ) [are the eleven Rudras; these were reckoned as gods at the time of the Prajapati Manu; the Siddhas and Sadhyas, different as to perfect conduct and youth; the Rbhus and the Maruts were also classes of gods (C. devanam cadito ganah; B. codito ganah); thus are enumerated the Vicvedevas and the Acrins. Amongst them the Adityas are kshatriyas, the Maruts vaiçuas, the Acvins (engaged in penances) çūdras; the gods [called] Angirasah are brahmans. The person who at morn recites the names of these deities becomes cleansed of all his sine. Yavakrita, etc. (c), and Kanva, etc. (f), all reside in the east; Unmuca, etc.  $(\eta)$ , in the south; Ushangu, etc.  $(\theta)$ , in the west; Atreya, etc.  $(\iota)$ , in the north. These are the witnesses [of the universe] and the creators of all the worlds. By reciting these names one is cleansed of all one's sins; by sojourning to these points a person becomes cleansed of all his sins and succeeds in returning home in safety (XII. 208) .- § 666: Yudhishthira inquired about the reason of Krehnu's assuming the form of an animal. Bhishma said that formerly, while hunting, he arrived at the hermituge of Markandeya, where he was honoured by R., and M.-r. Kacyapa related: In former days Da. and As. Naraka, etc., oppressed D. and D.-r.; the earth seemed to be oppressed with a heavy weight. The Adityas repaired to Brahman, who said that Vishnu in the form of a boar would slay the As. Some time afterwards Vishnu (having yoga for his soul, etc.) penetrated into the earth (into Rasatala) in the form of a boar, and uttering tremendous roars (nadena). at which even D. with Indra became terror-stricken, pierced the As. with his hoofs, etc., whence he came to be called Brahmán explained to the gods that he was Krshna, the Creator of all things, the foremost of yogins, etc., he from whose navel the primeval lotus had sprung, etc. (XII, 209).- 667: Yudhishthira inquired about the nature of that high yoga by which emancipation may be attained. Bhishma related the old narrative of a discourse between a preceptor (the foremost of R.) and his disciple on emancipation: on adhyatma (undisclosed in the very Vedas); Vasudeva is the supreme [cause] of the universe; he is the origin of the Vedas (viçvasya brahmaņo mukham), etc.; he created P., D., R., Y., Ra., N., As., and men, etc.; having reduced everything into non-existence, he once more, in the beginning of a yuga, creates Prakrti; at the end of every yuga the Vedas and all other scriptures disappear; in consequence of the grace of Svayambhū, M.-r., through their penances, first re-acquire the Vedas and Itihasas; Svayambhū knows the Vedas, Brhaspati their Angas, Bhargava (i.e. Cukra) the Niticastra (science of morality, etc.), Narada the Gandharra (the science of music), Bharadvaja the science of arms (Dhanurgraham), Garqya the history of the celestial Rshis (devaratioaritam), Krahnatreya medicine, diverse other teachers the philosophical systems (Nydyatantrāņi, cf. Nīl.). Neither D. nor R. were [originally] able to apprehend Brahman; only Narayana knew it; from him R., the foremost D., As., and R .- r. of old learnt it. Etymology of Purusha (navadvāram puram vyāpya cets, v. 7679) (XII, 210). Continuation of Bhīshma's discourse explaining how the inclinations and instincts of a past life run towards the soul in a new life (XII, 211). Continuation of Bhishma's discourse on abstention from acts and the nature of knowledge. Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed on the faults that should be got rid of in order to attain to emancipation (XII, 212). Continuation of Bhishma's discourse (XII, 213). Bhishma's discourse on the means of conquering the senses (XII, 214). Bhishma's discourse on the consequences of attachment to the objects of the senses (XII, 215). Bhishma's discourse on the nature and causes of dreams. Darkness has been adopted by the Asuras; Brahman is difficult of attainment by either the gods or the Asuras; goodness, passion, and darkness belong to the deities and the Asuras; goodness is the attribute of the deities, while the two others belong to the Asuras; Brahman transcends all those attributes; it is pure knowledge, and is obtainable only by withdrawing the mind and the senses from all external objects (XII, 216). Who may be said to know Brahman; the distinction between pravrtti and nivrtti; the respective nature of prakrti and purushs; the nature and consequences of yogs (XII. 217). -668: Yudhishthirs inquired about the conduct by which

Janaka the king of Mithila attained to emancipation. Bhishma recited the old narrative of the conversation between Pancacikha und Janaka of Mithila, i.e. Pancacikhavākya (b) (XII, 218-219).-- § 669: Yudhishthira asked what leads to happiness and what to misery and what to freedom from fear; Bhishma's discourse on self-restraint (XII, 220). Yudhishthira's question about the merits of subsisting upon the remnants of sacrifices, and whother fasting be really a penance (tapas); Bhishma explained that though fasting is generally regarded as a penance, it is not so in reality, being rather an impediment to the acquisition of the knowledge of soul; living upon sacrificial remnants is regarded as fasting of the highest merit (XII. 221).-§ 670: Yudhishthira asked whother man should be regarded as the real door of acts. Bhishma related the old narrative of a discourse between the Daitya king Prahlada, who was unattached to worldly objects, etc., and Indra, who questioned Prahlada about the best means by which knowledge of the soul can be attained, etc., and was instructed by him. Indra became filled with wonder, and, having worshipped the Daitya king, proceeded to his own abode (XII, 222) .- § 671: Yudhishthira inquired about the kind of intelligence by adopting which a king deprived of kingdom and prosperity may still live on earth. Bhishma related the old narrative of the discourse between Indra and Virocana's son Bali, i.e. Bali-Vasava-sumvada(b) (XII, 223-225).- § 672: Bhishma related the old narrative of the discourse between Indra and the Asura Namuci. i.e. Cakra-Namuci-samvāda (b) (XII, 226).-- 673: Yudhishthira asked as to what is good for a man sunk into dire distress. Bhishma discoursed on fortitude, quoting the old narrative of the discourse between Bali and Vasava (Indra), i.e. Bali-Vāsava-samvāda (b) (XII, 227).-§ 674: Yudhishthira inquired about the indications of future greatness and future fall. Bhishma related the old story of the discourse between Cri and Cakra, i.e. Cri-Vasavasamvada (b) (XII, 229) .- § 675: Yudhishthira inquired about the practices that lead to the attainment of Brahman. Bhishma said that one engaged in the religion of nivetti, etc., can attain to Brahman, quoting the old narrative of the discourse between the wise Jaigishavya and Asita Devala. who was instructed by Jaigisharya to behave indifferently towards praise and blame, etc., "D., G., Pç., and Ra. cannot reach the rank which is his who has attained to the highest end" (XII, 230).- 676: Requested by Yudhishthira about the man that is dear to all, Bhishma quoted the words that Krehna, asked by Ugrasena, said to him on a former occasion on the subject of D.-r. Narada's qualifications (XII, 231).- § 677: Yudhishthira inquired about the origin and the end of all creatures, the nature of their thoughts and acts, of the divisions of time, and of the allotted periods of life in the respective epochs or yugas; having heard the discourse of Bhrgu to B.-r. Bharadvaja, he had become attached to yoga. Bhishma recited the old narrative of what the divine Vydsa said to his son Cuka (who had studied the Vedas with all their branches, and the Upanishads, and was desirous of leading the life of brahmacarya) about these very questions. Vydsa said: Only Brahman is without beginning and without end. R. have measured time thus: 15 winks of the eye = 1 kashtha; 30 kashthas = 1 kala; 30 to kalas = 1 muhurta; 30 muhurtas = 1 day and night; 30 days and nights = 1 month (=1 day and night of the Pitre, the lighted fortnight being their day and the dark fortnight their night); 12 months = 2 ayanas = 1 year = 1 day and night of the gods (udayayana, i.e. from winter solstice to summer solstice = the day; dakshindyana, i.e. from the latter to the former = the night). Moreover, there are the day and night of Brahmán and his years also. Of the Krta-yuga the duration is 4,000 [celestial] years, with a morning (sandhyā) of 400 years and an evening (sandhyāmça) of 400; the other yugas gradually decrease by a quarter. In the Krta age all duties exist in their entirety, and all live for 400 years (free from disease, etc.); in the other gugas duty, etc., decrease by a quarter. The duties for the several yugas are different. In Krta penance is foremost, in Treta knowledge, in Dvāpara sacrifice, in Kali gift. These 12,000 [celestial!] years constitute a yuga; 1,000 yugas = 1 day of Brahmán (when the universe starts into life) = 1 night of Brahmán ( = universal dissolution, the Creator being asleep, having taken recourse to yoga, meditation). Brahman. waking up, modifies the indestructible Bráhman, etc. (XII, 232). Vyāsa explained the creation, etc. (XII, 233). Vyūsa told how the Supreme Lord merges everything into his soul (XII, 234). Vyāsa discoursed on the duties of a brahman; "they that are good deserve to have even Uccarheravas": Satyasandha, having offered his life to save a brahman, ascended to heaven; likewise Sankrti's son Rantideva, having given topid water to Vasishtha; Atreya Indradamana, having given wealth to a deserving person; Cibi Auçīnara, having given his limbs and son for the sake of a brahman; the Kāçi king Pratardana, having given his eyes to a brahman; king Devāvrdha, having given a costly umbrella (with all the people of his kingdom); Sānkrti Ātreya, having given instructions to his disciples on Brahman; Ambarisha, having given eleven arbudas of kine to the brahmans (with all the people of his kingdom); Savitri [i.e. Savitra = Karna, cf. XIII, 6253], by giving away the ear-rings; Janamejaya, by giving away his own body; Yuvanāçva Vrehādarbhi, by giving gems, a mansion, and beautiful women; the Videha king Nimi gave away his kingdom, Jamadagnya (Paracu-Rama) the whole earth, Gaya the earth with her towns (to the brahmans); Vacishtha, when the clouds ceased to pour rain, kept alive all creatures; Karandhama's son Maruta, by giving away his daughter to Angiras, ascended to heaven; king Brahmadatta Pāñcālya, by giving the jewel Cankha (to brahmans); king Mitrasaha, by giving his dear wife Madayanti to Vasishtha (with that wife of his); R.-r. Sahasrajit, having given his life for the sake of a brahman; king Catadyumna, having given to Mudgala a house made of gold, etc.; the Calva king Dyutimat, having given unto Roika his kingdom; R.-r. Lomapada, having given his daughter Canta to Rehyacringa (obtained all his wishes); R.-r. Madiraçua, by giving his daughter to Hiranyahasta; king Prasenajit, by giving 100,000 cows with calves; etc. (XII, 235). Continuation of Vydsa's discourse on the duties of a brahman: the knowledge that should be acquired (a); knowledge is necessary for emancipation (XII, 236). The different stages of a yogin's progress (XII, 237). Asked by Cuka, Vyāsa discoursed on the character of that knowledge which leads to emancipation (XII, 238). Vyāsa's discourse on whether acts are obligatory or optional; "the men of the Treta, Dvapara, and Kali yugas are inspired with doubts; the men of the Krta yuga are devoted to penances, etc. In the beginning of the Treta, the Vedas and sacrifices and the divisions of caste and the several modes of life exist in their entirety; in consequence, however, of the duration of life having decreased in Dvapara, all these things likewise decline; in the Dvapara age, and even in the Kali, the Vedas are overtaken with perplexity; towards the close of the Kali again it is doubtful if they ever become even visible to the eye" (XII, 239). Asked by Çuka, Vyasa discoursed on the import of those duties that lead to emancipation; "in the feet [of living creatures] is Vishnu; in their arms Indra; within the stomach Agni; in the ears are the quarters; in the tongue is speech which is Sarasvati"; success cannot be attained to without knowledge, penances, subjugation of the senses, and renunciation; the doctrine of knowledge as expounded in the Sankhya system (XII, 240). The doctrine of Yoga (XII, 241). Asked by Cuka, Vyasa reconciled the declarations of the Veda about acts and abstention from acts (XII, 242). Cuka inquired about how emancipation may be acquired without violating the ordinance about the obligatory character of acts: Vyāsa's discourse on the duties of brahmacarins (XII, 243). Vyāsa's discourse on the duties of the householder (XII, 244). The duties of the forest stage of life. "The fourth stage [of life] is based upon the Upanishads; the duties laid down for it [i.e. renunciation] may be observed in all the stages of life equally; this stage differing from the others comes after domestic and forest life; in this very guga many learned brahmans have been known to observe this stage; Agastya, etc. ( $\beta$ ), were the authors of this course of duties, and themselves observing them have all proceeded to heaven; and so also Sudivatandi (yathāvāso 'kṛtaçramaḥ, i.e. who had no fixed residence), and the numerous Yayararas, etc. (7); freed from fear and not being counted among the stars and planets (anakshatrah), [these] are to be seen in the firmament [as] hosts of luminous bodies (jyotishām ganāh)" (XII, 245). Cuka inquired how one leading the forest mode of life should act wishing to achieve emancipation; Vyūsa's answer about the necessity, after having passed through the first and the second stages, of having recourse to yoga in order to attain to emancipation; the duties to be observed by such a man (XII, 246). Vyāsa's observations on the soul (jiva) and the Supreme Soul (XII, 247). Cuka asked what is adhyālma and whence it comes; Vyāsa's explanation of adhyātma; Cuka asked how one may succeed in understanding the unequal distribution of the five elements in different objects, and which among those elements represents which sense, etc.; Vyāsa's observations on the nature of mind, understanding, and the soul (XII, 248). Continuation (XII, 249). Do. (XII, 250). Cuka inquired about what constitutes the highest duty; Vyūsa's discourse on duties (XII, 251). Continuation (XII, 252). The relation of the senses and their objects to the five primal elements (XII, 253). Persons conversant with the scriptures succeed in beholding the soul, etc.; . . . the practice of yoga has been recommended by Çandilya (XII, 254). The tree of desire, its seed and roots and branches and leaves and fruit (XII, 255). Bhishma recapitulated the substance of Vyūsa's discourse on the respective attributes of the elements (XII, 256).- § 678: Yudhishthira lamented the carnage caused on the field of Kuruksheira. Bhishma recited the story of Anukampaka (1) with Mrtyu-Prajāpati-samvāda (c) (XII, 257-259) .- § 679: Yudhishthira asked what is righteousness and whether righteousness is for this world or for the next or for both. Bhishma's answer: the practices of the good, the Smrtis, and the Vedas, etc., according to R. of old (XII, 260). Continuation (XII, 261).-\$ 680: Inquired of by Yudhishthira about righteousness (XII, 262) Bhīshma related the old narrative of the conversation of Tuladhara with Jajali on the topic of righteousness, i.e. Tuladhara-Jājali-samvāda (b) (XII, 263-265).-§ 681: Bhīshma related an old narrative of what was recited by king Vicakhyu (B. okhno) through compassion for all creatures. in condemnation of unimal slaughter when he saw the mangled body of a bull and heard the painful groans of the kine in a cow sacrifice, and observed the cruel brahmaus gathered there to assist at the ceremonies. "Manu has applauded harmlessness in all acts. . . . The true brahmans realize the presence of Vishnu in every sacrifice." Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma said that one should acquire merit and act in such a way that one's body may not languish and suffer pain, and that death may not come (XII, 266).- § 682: Yudhishthira asked whether one should act speedily or with delay. Bhishma told the old story of what occurred with respect to the wise Cirakarin, the son of Medhātithi Gautama of the ruce of Angiras (Angirase kule), who came to be called thus because he used to reflect long upon all matters, etc., and was regarded as an idle and foolish person. Once M.-r. Gautama (the foremost of practisers of yoga), witnessing an act of grave misconduct in his wife Ahalyā, in wrath commanded Cirakārin to slav her, and then departed for the woods. Cirakarin began to think for a long while (description), remembering that the father is the performer of garbhadhana and sīmantonnayana, etc., and that the mother is the son's dhātrī, etc. (etymology of several names of the mother and of the father), etc.; he thought that his mother was not to blame, as Indra had come to her in the form of her husband, etc. When many days had expired Gautama returned, shedding tears of repentance and thinking that the fault committed was due to his own carelessness (etymology of two names of the wife), and now became filled with great joy, and from that time, dwelling in his hermitage, did not live separately from his spouse or his son. He said: "Blessed be thou, O Cirakarika! do thou always reflect long before acting," uttering some verses upon the merits of reflecting long. Gautama at last ascended to heaven with his son (XII, 267) .- § 683: Yudhishthira asked how a king should protect his subjects without injuring anybody. Bhishma related the old narrative of the conversation between Dyumatsena and his son king Satyavat, and the words spoken by the latter in behalf of some individuals who had been brought out for execution at the command of his father ("the killing of individuals can never be a righteous act"), quoting the instructions he had received from their grandsires of olden days, as to how kings should rule their subjects in the different ages (a); "when the Kali age sets in . . . fifteen parts of even that one-fourth of righteousness disappear, one-sixteenth thereof being all that then remains of it," and quoting Manu Svayambhuva (XII, 268).—§ 684: Yudhishthira inquired about the relative superiority of domestic life and yoga. Bhishma recited the old narrative of the discourse between the Yati Kapila and Syumaraçmi on animal sacrifices, the obligatory character of acts, and the merits of yoga and renunciation. In days of old when Trashir came to king Nahuska, the latter was on the point of killing a cow in order to show him hospitality; Kapila said, "Alas! ye Vedas"; R. Syumaraçmi, entering the cow, blamed this saying of Kapila, etc. (XII, 269); the three classes of Pitra (a), etc. (XII, 270). Continuation (XII, 271). - § 685: Yudhishthira asked which among the three, viz. religion, profit, and pleasure, is superior. Bhishma recited the ancient narrative of the benefit that the cloud Kundadhara (not yet adored by other men) in days of old had conferred upon a poor brahman that was devoted to him, and who had failed to obtain wealth by worshipping the gods. The brahman worshipped the cloud with dhapas, etc.; the cloud became pleased and said to the brahman that the wise have ordained expiation for brahmanicide, drinking spirits, stealing, etc., but not for one that is ungrateful; "Expectation has a child named Iniquity, Wrath is a child of Envy, Cupidity of Deceit, Ingratitude is barren." After that the brahman, on a bod of kuça-grass and ponetrated with the energy of Kundadhara, beheld all living beings in a dream, and Manibhadra in the midst of the gods employed in giving his orders; the gods were engaged in bestowing kingdoms, etc., upon men, etc.; Kundadhara prostrated himself before the gods in the presence of all Y. and prayed for some favour in behalf of the brahman; Manibhadra first offered to give him wealth, but was prevailed upon by Kundadhara to give virtue alone. The brahman became disgusted with the world and entered the woods and practised severe penances (description), and his mind was firmly set upon virtue; his strength did not diminish, and after a long time he acquired spiritual vision, etc. Kundadhara then paid him a visit and caused him to see the end that is attained by kings; he beheld thousands of kings sunk in hell, and many living in this world embracing lust and wrath, etc. Kundadhara said: "With these [vices] all human beings are enchained; the gods are afraid of men; these vices, at the command of the gods, mar and disconcert on every side; no man can become virtuous unless permitted by the gods. . . ." The brahman confessed that he had not appreciated Kundadhara's favour as he ought to do; Kundadhara forgave him and disappeared. The brahman roamed through all the worlds, having attained to ascetic success (siddhim) through the grace of Kundadhara. D., brahmans, Y., good men, and Ca. always adore only the virtuous (XII, 272).- § 686: Yudhishthira asked what that sacrifice is which is ordained for the sake of virtue alone and not for the acquisition of heaven or wealth. Bhishma related the history, formerly recited by Narada, of a brahman named Satya, who in order to perform sacrifices lived according to the uncha vow (description); his wife Pushkaradhārinī did not approve of his conduct (i.e. his cruel sucrifices), but at his command she (clad in plumes of peacocks) joined a sacrifice where he was the hoty. His neighbour the virtuous Parnada at the command of Cukra (or, according to a various reading, of Cukra's race, so B., the text of C. is in disorder) addressed him in the shape of a deer, telling him to slay him and sacrifice-with him, and Savitri also told him to do so, but in vain; Savilri then entered the sacrificial fire; but the deer (who was Dharma), causing the brahman through spiritual vision to behold Aps. and G.. at first made him desire to slay the deer (at which his tapas diminished greatly), but then won him over to the ahimed religion, and himself assisted him in his sacrifice; "the injury of living creatures forms no part of sacrifice (leading only to heaven)" (XII, 273).- § 687: Yudhishthira inquired about how one becomes sinful, or virtuous, by what one attains to renunciation, and by what one wins omancipation, whereafter he was instructed by Bhishma (XII, 274). Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma expounded the means for attaining to emancipation (XII, 275) .- § 688: Continuation of Bhishma's discourse, quoting the old narrative of the discourse between Narada and Asita Devala, whom Narada questioned about the origin and destruction of all creatures (XII, 276).- 689: Yudhishthira inquired after the means for removing desire. Bhishma related the old narrative of what was said by the Videha king to the inquiring Mandarya: "Even if the whole of Mithila burn in a conflagration, nothing of mine will be burnt down." The brahman Mandavya became filled with joy and betook himself to the path of emancipation (XII, 277) .- § 690: Yudhishthira inquired about the good which one should pursue in view of the transient character of time. Bhishma related the old narrative of a discourse between a father, who was devoted only to the study of the Vedas, and his son Medhavin, who was conversant with the religion of emancipation. The father acted in the way pointed out [by his son] (XII, 278). - § 691: Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma explained of what behaviour a man should be, of what acts, of what kind of knowledge, etc., in order to be able to attain to Brahman (XII, 279) .- § 692: Yudhishthira asked when he should succeed in abandoning sovereignty for adopting renunciation. Bhishma's answer stating the certainty of Yudhishthira's acquisition of emancipation, and quoting that discourse which was sung in days of old, viz. the conversation between Dai. (As.) Vrtra, after he became divested of all his prosperity, and [his preceptor] Uçanas; Vrtra said: "Desirous of fighting Indra, 1 beheld in that battle Hari = Nārdyaņa, etc. (a)" (XII, 280); while Uçanas instructed him about l'ishnu whose head is the infinite place [i.e. emancipation], Sanatkumāra came there and, asked by Uçanas, instructed Vrtra; "Vishnu is Brahmán, etc." ( $\beta$ ); the six colours; the four higher regions  $(\gamma)$ ; the indestructible and infinite some say is the region of Mahadeva, etc. (δ). Vr/ra became free from sorrow, gave up his life-breaths, and attained to the highest station. Yudhishthira asked whether Krshna is identical with the Supreme Deity; Bhishma answered in the affirmative. Yudhishthira's applicate of Vrtra. Bhishma said that the Pandaras would in the end be numbered among the Siddhas (XII, 281).- § 693: Yudhishthira asked how Vrtra, whose virtue and devotion to Vishnu and comprehension of the Upanishads and the Fedanta were so great, was vanquished by Indra, and how the battle took place. Bhishma described the battle, i.e. Vrtra-vadha (b) (XII, 282-283).-§ 694: Yudhishthira inquired about the origin of fever. Bhishma narrated the Jvarotpatti (b) (XII, 284).- § 695: Janamejaya (!) inquired how the horse-sacrifice of Prajapati Daksha Pracetusa was destroyed during the age of Manu Vaivasvata by Cira in consequence of Uma's rage and grief, and how Daksha was enabled to reunite the divided limbs of that sacrifice. Vaicampayana (!) narrated the Dakshayajña-vināça (b).-§ 696: Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma told the 1,008 names by which Daksha adored Cica, i.e. Daksha-prokta-Civasahasra-nāma-stotra (b) (XII, 285).- § 697: Yudhishthira again inquired about adhyatma, and had it explained by Bhishma (XII, 286).- § 698: Yudhishthira inquired how sorrow and death may be avoided. Bhishma related the old narrative of the discourse between Narada and Samanga (XII, 287).- § 699: Yudhishthira asked what is beneficial for one who is not conversant with the scriptures, etc. Bhishma related the old narrative of the discourse between Galara and D.-r. Narada (devoted to yoga) about the ācramas, etc. (XII, 288) - § 700: Yudhishthira inquired how a king should behave in view of the great object of acquisition, and what attributes he should have for freeing himself from attachments. Bhishma recited the old narrative that was uttered by Tarkshya Arishtansmi to Sagara, who asked his counsel. Sagara acquired those virtues which are productive of emancipation and continued, with their aid, to rule his subjects (XII, 289) .- § 701: Yudhishthira asked why D.-r. Uçanas Karya (Bhargavadayada) sided with the Asuras and not with the gods, and whence he came to be called Cukra; whence he got such superior excellence. and why he does not succeed in travelling to the centre of the firmament. Bhishma related the Bhava-Bhargavasamāgama (b) (XII, 290).—§ 702: Yudhishthira inquired about the acts by performing which one wins the highest good both here and hereafter. Bhishma narrated what king Janaka in days of yore had inquired of Paraçara about the duties of life. "The sceptic argues: the deities, G., and Da. have become what they are in consequence of their own nature" (XII, 291). Continuation (XII, 292). "Rantideva obtained success in all the worlds by worshipping the ascetics with offerings of only roots and fruits and leaves. The royal son of Cibi won the highest regions of bliss by gratifying Surva along with his companion with offerings of the same kind. . . . Rolka's son became the son of Viçvamitra by adoring the gods with Rcs. Uçanas became Cukra by gratifying the god of gods, and by hymning Devi he sports in the firmament. M.-r. Asita, etc. (a), by adoring Vishnu with Res and by penances attained to success" (XII, 293). Continuation. "Svayambhū first created Dhatr; Dhatr created a son who was engaged in upholding all the worlds" (v. the note of PCR., p. 539) (XII, 294). Continuation. "The Asuras could not bear that righteousness that prevailed in the world; multiplying they [in the form of Lust and Wrath, PCR.] entered the bodies of men; then was pride generated in men . . .; at that time the gods repaired to Civa and imparted to him their conjoined energy, and he felled to earth with a single shaft those three Asuras, viz. Desire, Wrath, and Cupidity, who were staying in the firmament, along with their very habitations, and also the chief of those Asuras (i.e. Mahamoha, PCR.); the men again obtained their proper natures and began once more to study the Vedas, etc. Then the seven R. came forward and installed Indra as the chief of the gods, and took upon themselves the task of holding the rod of chastisement over mankind. After the seven R. came king Viprthu, etc., of the kshatriya order; but there were certain elderly men from whose minds all wicked feelings did not fly away" (XII, 295). Continuation. "Brahmán by penances created all existent objects;  $\bar{A}$ ., V., etc. ( $\beta$ ), have all been crowned with success through their penances" (XII, 296). Asked by Janaka, Paraçara expounded the reason of the difference of colour in men; "originally sprung from Brahmán, all the inhabitants of the earth should have been brahmans." Various kinds of kshatriyas, etc.  $(\gamma)$ , have sprung from the four original orders' by intermixture. Janaka asked how those born in pure wombs and those in impure ones all became brahmans.

Paracara said that it was by cleansing their souls by penances, instancing Vasishtha, etc. (8). "Originally only four gotras arose: Angiras, Kaçyapa, Vasishtha, and Bhrgu; the others have been due to the penances of those that have founded them" (XII, 297). Continuation. "Repairing to the Sarasvati, etc. (a) one should make gifts, etc." (XII, 298). Continuation of Paracara's discourse on duties. Janaka heard everything the R. said and obtained great happiness from it (XII, 299). - § 703: Yudhishthira asked what opinion should be entertained about the virtues of truth, self-restraint, forgiveness, and wisdom. Bhishma recited the old narrative of the discourse between the Sadhyas and a Swan (hamsa), who was Brahmán wandering through the three worlds, and having come upon the Sadhyas instructing them about the religion of emancipation; at last the Sadhyas put a series of detached questions. which were answered by the Swan (XII, 300).- § 704: Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed on the difference between the Sankhya and the Yoga [systems of philosophy]; what the kinds of diet are by taking which and what the things are by conquoring which a yogin acquires yoga power; "the yogin can at his will enter into and emerge from Brahmán, etc. (a) . . .; the yogin has Nārāyaṇa for his soul; prevailing over all things, he is capable of creating all things" (XII, 301). Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed on the principles of the Sankhya [philosophy]; these principles have been established by all the puissant Yatis, Kapila, etc.; with the objects are engaged men, Pc., etc. (β); "Vishnu is attached to [the organs of] motion, Indra to [those of] strength, Agni to the stomach. etc.; . . . Sattva is attached to the soul; the soul has Nārāyana for its refuge, and he has emancipation for his refuge; emancipation is independent of all refuge; . . . the Prajāpatis, etc. ( $\gamma$ ), fall away from their puissance in course of many long ages; . . . the miseries endured by those that fall into the river Vaitarani in the realms of Yama . . . the swallowing up of the moon and the sun by Rahu, the falling of stars from their fixed positions and the diversions of constellations from their orbits . . . lead the Sankhyas to seek emancipation"; the faults attaching to one's body; "the knowledge of Fedanta is the island of the ocean of life; . . . Sattva carries the Yatis to Narayana; Narayana carries them to the Supreme Soul (paramatmanam)." Yudhishthira inquired whether there is any consciousness in the emancipate state; Bhīshma's answer. Praise of the Sankhya philosophy (XII, 302). - § 705: Yudhishthira inquired about what does deteriorate and what does not. Bhishma related the old narrative of the discourse between R. Vasishtha and king Karala-Janaka, who asked for his instruction. "At the end of Brahmán's night (differently Nil. and PCR., cf. note, p. 589), Cambhu of formless soul, etc., awakes, and once more creates that first or eldest of all creatures; the eldest-born being is called Hiranyagarbha = Buddhi = Mahat (Yogeshu) = Viriñci = the unborn; in the Sankhya scriptures (Sankhye castre) he has many names . . . "; the creations of knowledge and of ignorance; "bodies are possessed by all bodiless creatures, D., etc. (a); . . . transcending the twenty-four topics already adverted to is the twenty-fifth called Vishnu." "There are three colours in all: white, red, and dark" (XII, 303). Continuation (XII, 304). Do. (XII, 305). Do. "That which the Yogins behold is precisely that to which the Sankhyae strive to attain" (XII, 306).

Continuation (XII, 307). Vasishtha's discourse on what is Vidya and what is Aridya. " Yogins have great regard for the Sankhya system, as also for the I'edas; in the Sankhya system no principle transcending the twenty-fifth is admitted; in the Yoga it is said that Brahman . . . becomes the personal soul (jiva) only when invested with ignorance; in the Yoga scriptures, therefore, both Brahman and jīva are spoken of " (PCR.) (XII, 308). Vasishtha's discourse on buddha and abuddha. "I had acquired this knowledge from the eternal Hiranyagarbha himself, who communicated it to me for my having carefully gratified that great Being of very superior Soul . . .; it has been imparted to thee exactly as I had it from Brahman himself." Bhishma said, "This knowledge was obtained by Vasishtha from Hiranyagarbha, from Vasishtha it was handed over to Narada, and from this to me" (XII, 309) .- § 706: Bhishma recited the conversation between king Vasumat, son of Janaka, and a brahman and R. of Bhrgu's race, whom Vasumat saw in the forests when in pursuit of deer, and by whom he was instructed. "R.-r. Mahabhisha, through want of firmness, fell from heaven; Yayati, though his merits had become exhausted, succeeded in regaining regions of bliss through his firmness." King Vasumat, withdrawing his mind from the pursuit of desire, set. it upon the acquisition of righteousness (XII, 310).—§ 707: Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed on that which is freed from duty and its reverse by reciting the old narrative of the discourse between R. Yajñavalkya and king Daivarāti Janaka, who got instruction from Yājñavalkya. The nine kinds of creation (XII, 311). Yajñavalkya's discourse on the creation of the universe; "10,000 kalpas are said to constitute a single day of the unmanifest one; the duration of his night is equal; when his night expires he awakes, and first creates herbs and plants; he then creates Brahmán or Prajapati, who springs from a golden egg . . . ; 7,500 kalpas measure the day of Brahmán, and his night is of equal duration; Brahmán (mahān rshih) then creates Ahankara (i.e. consciousness; bhutam divyātmakam), etc." (XII, 312). Yājňavalkya's discourse on the destruction of the universe: "Brahmán, who is eternal and undecaying, and who is without beginning and without end, repeatedly creates and destroys all created objects; when his day expires and night comes he becomes desirous of sleep; at such a time the unmanifest and holy one urges the Being called Maha-Rudra (ahamkrtam naram, i.e. Ahankārābhimāninam, Nil.), who assumes the form of Surya and divides himself into twelve portions, etc.: . . . Consciousness (Ahankāruḥ Prajāpatɪḥ) in his turn is swallowed up by the Great Soul (mahān ātmā; v. 11601: the reading of B. is different), who (vicvam) is again swallowed up by Cambhu Prajapati, [who is] Animan, etc. (a) . . . " (XII, 313). Yajñavalkya's discourse on adhyatma ("the two feet," etc.), adhibhūta ("the act of walking," etc.), and adhidairata ("Viehņu," etc.) (XII, 314). Yajñavalkya's discourse on sattva, rajas, und tamas (XII, 315). Yajñavalkya's discourse of what is possessed of attributes and what is not possessed of them (XII, 316). Yājñavalkya's discourse on the Yoga philosophy, "conferring eight kinds of puissance and possessed of eight limbs" (XII, 317). Yājňavalkya's discourse on the diverse ends that people attain to as depending on the manner in which the soul (jiva) escapes from its mortal frame (XII, 318). The story of Yajnavalkya's acquisition of the Yajurveda, as a boon from Sarva, who had been gratified with his penances: Sūrya had said: "Made up of the essence of speech, the goddess Sarasvatī will enter into thy body"; "he then commanded me to open my mouth; Sarasvali then entered into my body and I began to burn, and plunged into a stream, angry with Sarya, who told me that the burning would soon cease, and then the whole Voda with its appendix and the Upanishads would appear in me by inward light, and I should edit the entire Calapatha, and then turn to the path of emancipation, coveted both by Sankhyas and by Yogins. Surya then went to the Asta hills. Sarawati appeared before me (description). I taught the Catapathabrahmana, etc., to 100 good disciples and thereby did what was disagreeable to my maternal uncle [Vaicampayana]. I undertook the management of the sacrifice of thy father; there a dispute arose between me and my maternal uncle as to who should be permitted to appropriate the dakshina for the recitation of the Vedas; in the very presence of Devala I took half of that dakshina; thy father and Sumantu and Paila and Jaimini, etc., all acquiesced in that arrangement. I had thus got from Surya the fifteen Yajushes, and likewise Romaharsha learned the Paranas (differently PCR.). Aided by Sarasvati and Sürya I then set myself to compile the Catapathabrahmana. . . . G. Viçvavasu (Kāçyapa, v. 11777), conversant with the Vedanta, once put me twenty-four questions relating to the Vedas, and then a twenty-fifth (anvikshikim) (a); having thought of Sarasvatī I answered them properly, having expounded to him the fourth science that treats of emancipation, and which is based upon the twenty-fifth principle, i.e. jiva." (The answers to the questions.) The personal soul (jiva) and the Supreme Soul should be regarded as one and the same. This Viçvavasu thought difficult to understand, quoting Jaigisharya, etc. (B); "M.-r. in Brahmaloka say that Aditya (the sun) himself is thy preceptor." Yājñavalkya instructed him of the relation of the twenty-fifth (jiva) to the twenty-sixth (the Supreme Soul). "Viçvavasu proceeded towards heaven, and inculcated the science he had obtained from me to the gods in Brahmaloka, etc." Honoured by Dairarāti, Yājāavalkya left his court; the king gave a million of kine, etc., to a number of brahmans; installing his son in the sovereignty of the Videhas, he adopted the practices of the Yatis, and began to study the science of the Sankhyas and Yogins. "They who wait upon Mahat attain to the regions of Mahat; they who wait upon Consciousness attain to the spot that belongs to Consciousness, etc." "I(Bhishma) got all this knowledge from Janaka, who had obtained it from Yajñavalkya" (XII, 319).- § 708: Yudhishthira asked how one may avoid decrepitude and death. Bhishma related the old narrative of the Bhikshu M.-r. Pañcacikha and king Janaka Vaideha, who put him that same question and was instructed by him (XII, 320).- § 709: Arked by Yudhishthira as to how it is possible for a householder to attain to emancipation, Bhīshma recited the Sulabhā-Janakasamvāda (b) (XII, 321) .- § 710: Yudhishthira inquired how in days of old Cuka Vaiyasaki was won over to renunciation (nirvedam apannah). Bhishma recited the discourse of Vydsa to Cuka expounding the vanity "That sinful wretch who of worldly attachments. transgresses the ten boundaries that have been fixed by Svayambhū himself is obliged to pass his time in great affliction in the wild wastes in the dominions of the king of the Pitre; that man who is tainted with cupidity . . .

has to go to deep hells . . . and is forced to bathe in the broad river Vaitarant, whose waters are scalding, etc. (description of hell). . . . Very soon the wind of Yama will blow before thee. . . . By performing the duties of the domestic life men attain to the region of Prajapati or Brhaspati or Indra." Cuka, leaving his father, proceeded to seek a preceptor that could teach him the religion of emancipation (XII, 322).—§ 711: Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma discoursed on the efficacy of gifts, sacrifices, penances, services to preceptors, etc. (XII, 323).-§ 712: Cukotpatti (q.v.).—§ 713: Cukakrti (q.v.).—§ 714: Çukakrtya (q.v.).—§ 715: Çuka-Nārada-samvāda (q.v.).— § 716: Çukābhipatana (q.v.) Mrtyu = Sūrya (the sun): III, 146.—Do. = Çiva (1000

Mrtyu' ("Death"), fem. § 594 (Akampana): Nărada said to Akampana: In the beginning the Grandsire Brahmán created all creatures. As the creation bore no sign of decay, he began to think about the destruction of the universe. Failing to find any means of destruction, he became angry, and in consequence of his anger a fire sprang from the apertures of his body (khebhyah) and destroyed all creatures. Then Civa (the lord of all the wanderers at night) appealed to Brahman (the greatest of ascetics), who said, "Thou hast been born out of our wish" (kāmāt) (VII, 52), and that the Earth, afflicted with the heavy weight of creatures, had asked him to destroy them. Civa, saying that he had been appointed by Brahmán the protector of creatures, prevailed upon Brahmán to keep his wrath within his own inner self and extinguish the fire. Then Brahmán expounded the doctrine of pravrtti and nivrtti. From his organs of sense (gobhyah, cf. khebhyah in a parallel passage, XII, 9179) then issued a female who was dark, etc., and set out for the southern quarter; Brahmán called her Death (Mrtyu) and told her to slay the creatures. She wept, but Brahmán caught her tears with his two hands and implored her (VII, 53)—who wished to go to the hermitage of Dhenuka to perform austerities—to slay the creatures. Soon Brahman smiled, the creatures continued to live as before, and Mrtyu proceeded to Dhenuka, where she practised austere vows during twenty-one times ten billions of years, and then she wandered 10,000 billions of years with the creatures. Next she repaired to Nanda and there passed 8,000 years, and became purified from all her sins. Then she went to Kauciki, where she lived upon air and water only. Then she repaired to Pancaganga and next to Velasaka (C. Ceo), then to the Ganga and thence to Meru, motionless and suspending her life-breaths. Thence to the top of Himavat (where the gods had performed sacrifices) for a billion of years standing on the toe only of her feet. Then to Pushkara, and Gokarna, and Naimisha, and Malaya, with steady devotion to the Grandsire without acknowledging any other god. Brahman was gratified with her and said that in slaying the creatures she should be without sin; Yama and the diseases should become her helpmates. She prevailed upon him that the passions, covetousness, etc., should tear the bodies of the creatures before she slew them. Her tears which were in his hands should become diseases springing from the creatures themselves and kill men; she should be the virtue of living creatures and the goddess of this virtue. Sin would slay those who were of wicked behaviour; "it will be thy work to sink them in their sins that are wicked." Narada further expounded the nature of death and told Akampana not to grieve for his dead son: VII, 53, 2068, 2070 (kamalalocana); 54, (2074), 2082, 2088, 2101, 2105, 2112, †2117, †2118, †2122 (devasyshfā), †2123 (dandapanih). - § 595 (Abhimanyuvadhap.): VII, 55, 2134 (°samutpattim, all. to § 594); 71, 2471 (sambhavo M°oh, do.). - § 678b (Mrtyu-Prajāpatisamv.): XII, 258, 9182, 9185; 259, 9195, 9197, 9201, 9204, 9212, 9214, 9219, †9220, Mucukundopākhyāna(m) ("the episode relating to Mucukunda"). § 641g (Rājadh.). King Mucukunda, having subjugated the whole earth, repaired to Kubera in order to test his strength. Kubera created a large force of Rā., who annihilated the forces of Mucukunda. Mucukunda rebuked his priest Vasishtha, who then by penances caused those Rā. to be slain. Kubera's haughty address and Mucukunda's manly answer.

Mudāvarta (V, 2729), v. Udāvarta.

Mudgala, a rshi. § 391 (Rshyagraga): III, 113, 10093 (Nārāyanīvendrasenā, i.e. the wife of M., babhūra vaçyā nityam M°sya).—§ 520 (Vrihidraunikap.): 111, 260, 15404.— § 520 (cf. Vrihidraunikap.): Vyāsa said: There lived in Kurukshetra a virtuous sage named Mudgala, who lived by picking up ears of corn and grain, collecting a drona of corn during one fortnight and eating it together with his son and wife the other fortnight; yet he celebrated the sattra called ishtīkrta and the darça- and pauramāsa-sacrifices, where Indra himself and the gods partook of the food offered, and entertained his guests with food, for the remainder of the drona of corn increased as soon as a guest appeared, so that hundreds of brahmans were fed with it; he lived himself on the food that remained after the gods and the guests had eaten. Having heard of M., Durvaeae, naked and frantic, came to him uttering insulting words, and during six seasons ate up all his food, without perceiving any agitation in M.'s heart. Durvasas then told M. that in reward he should go to heaven even in his own body. Immediately a celestial messenger (devadūta) appeared upon a chariot yoked with swans and cranes, etc., and invited M. to ascend it. M. first asked the devaduta to tell him about the advantages and disadvantages of heaven (III, 260). The devaduta then described heaven (Svarga) (atheists and untruthful persons and those who have not practised ascetic austerities and those who have not performed great sacrifices cannot repair thither), with its advantages: myriads of beautiful worlds owned by the gods, the Sadhyas, the Viçve, the maharshis, the Yamas, the Dhamas, the Gandharvas, and the Apsarases; Meru extending over 33,000 yojanas; the gardens of the celestials; Nandana, etc.; no grief, etc., no sweat, stench, excreta, nor urine, nor dust; the foremost regions are the regions of Brahmán (Brāhmanāh . . . lokāh); thither repair sanctified rehis and there dwell the Rbhus, the gods of the gods themselves, who suffer no pangs from women, do not possess wealth, etc., do not subsist on oblations nor amrta, and cannot be perceived by the senses, nor do they change at the revolution of a kalpa; for them there is neither ecstasy, nor joy, nor happiness, nor misery, etc.; they are thirty-three in number, to their regions repair wise men after having observed excellent vows, and also M. had acquired that success by his charity. Its disadvantages: while reaping the fruit of his acts a person cannot be engaged in any others, for this world is one of acts, the other one of fruition; after one has entirely exhausted his merit, he is subject to fall; he is then stupefied and agitated by omotions, and when the garlands of those who are to fall fade away, fear invades their hearts; but by reason of their merits they take birth among men, and then they attain to high fortune and happiness, while, if one cannot acquire knowledge here, he comes by an inferior birth. As M. did not desire to go to heaven, but asked a region where people have not to lament nor to be pained nor agitated, the devaduta described to him the supreme seat of Vishnu, which is called the highest Brahman and lies above the abode of Brahmán; thither only those who are free from selfishness, etc., and those who are given to contemplation and yoga, can repair. Then M. bade farewell to the devadūta, and being always engaged in meditation, etc., he at last attained to that supreme state of perfection (jagama cacratam siddhim param nirvanalakshanam). "Therefore," Vyasa continued, "you also, O son of Kunti, ought not to grieve; after the thirteenth year you will get back your kingdom." Having said this Vyasa returned to his hermitage to practise austerities (III, 261): III, 260, 15407, 15415, 15418, 15420, 15427, 15434; 261, 15443, 15448, 15469, 15476, (15481).-- § 677 (Mokshadh.): XII, 235, 8606 (Çatadyumna went to heaven after having given a mansion to M.). - § 7218 (Viçvāmitrop.): XIII, 48, 250 (the same?, son of Viçvāmitra). [Nahushopākhyāna] ("the episode relating to Nahusha"). § 755b (Anuçasanik.): Nahusha, having acquired the sovereignty of heaven, performed both human and celestial acts, for instance buli and offering of incense and of light, etc.; and although he had become the chief of the gods, he yet worshipped the gods as in days of yore. But then he was filled with pride in consequence of the boon he had received from all the gods, and he ceased to perform religious actions; for a very long time he used to employ the R. by turns as the bearers of his vehicles; but in consequence of his abstention from religious acts his energy began to diminish; when it was Agastya's turn to carry the vehicle, Bhrgu came to the hermitage of Agastya (Maitrāvaruņi), and when the latter, mentioning Brahmán's boon to Nahusha (that whoever would come within the range of his eyesight would, deprived of all energy, be within his sway), and that Brahmán had given him ampta to drink, despaired of being able to curse him, Bhrgu said that he had come at the command of Brahmán, and that he would curse Nahusha to be a snake, when he insulted Agastya by a kick, and this very day he would hurl him down and re-establish Indra. Agastya became highly gratified (XIII, 99). Asked by Yudhishthira, Bhishma continued [referring to and developing the beginning of XIII, 99: Nahusha's sacrificial rites and presents were obstructed by Ra.]: Nahusha ordered R. Agastya to carry the vehicle from the banks of Sarasvati. Bhrgu, telling Agastya to close his eyes, had entered the matted locks of Agastya, taking care not to cast his eyes upon Nahusha. Nahusha urged Agastya on with his goad and then struck him on the head with his left foot. Then Nahusha was cursed by Bhrgu and transformed into a snake, but, in consequence of his gifts, etc., he retained his memory, and, assisted by Agastya, pacified Bhrgu, who said that Yudhishthira would rescue him, and then went to the abode of Brahmán and informed him, while Agustya returned to his own hermitage. Brahmán once more installed (caused the gods to instal) Indra in the sovereignty of heaven. "Thou hast, O king, rescued Nahusha from Bhrgu's curse; he ascended to the abode of Brahmán before thy eyes; in consequence of the merits he had acquired through acts of the kind I have mentioned, he succeeded in once more regaining his lost position. Hence, when evening comes, persons leading the domestic mode of life, should give lumps" (XIII, 100).

Nakulākhyāna ("the narrative of the mungoose"). §11 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 609.—§ 786b (Anugītāparvan): At the conclusion of Yudhishthira's horse sacrifice, after everybody had been gratified, a blue-eyed mungoose, with one side of its body changed into gold, came and said, in voice as loud and deep as thunder, that this great sacrifice was not equal to a prastha of powdered barley given away by a liberal brahman of Kurukshetra, who was observing the uncha- (or the pigeon-)vow. Asked by the brahmans the mungoose related: The brahman named lived with his wife, son, and daughter-in-law, and practised penances; he used to eat every day at the sixth division; during a famine he had nothing to eat day after day; one day in the month of Jyaishtha, while the sun was in the meridian, he was picking up grains of corn, but got nothing; one day, after the sixth division had come, he obtained a prastha of barley, which they reduced to powder for making saktu; having finished their recitations and libations, etc., they divided the powdered barley among themselves, so that each got a kudara; then came a guest, who ate all the portions, the wife, son, and daughter-in-law with difficulty prevailing upon the brahman to give their portions as well. The guest turned out to be Dharma; flowers were rained down from heaven; D.-r, D., G., Devadūtas, etc., and B.-r. standing in vimanas and dwelling in Brahmaloka were struck with wonder; "I have been rescued, and others who have not yet come (anagatah) have been rescued for countless yugas; he that gives away 100 having 1,000, 10 having 100, and a handful of water having no wealth, are equal in merit," citing Rantidera (c), Nrga (d), and Çibi Auçīnara; "thou hast conquered Brahmaloka." The brahman, with his wife, son, and daughter-in-law, proceeded to heaven on a celestial chariot. The mungoose continued: "I came out of my hole, and by the contact with the powder of barley, etc., my head and half of my body became gold; in order to convert the rest of my body into gold I repeatedly repair to the hermitages of ascetics and to the sacrifices of kings; I came hither with high hopes, but I have not been made into gold." Then the mungoose disappeared (XIV, 90).— That mungoose was Dharma, who having injured Jamadagni (f) had been cursed by the Pitrs, but became freed from the curse by disparaging himself in the form of Yuthishthira (XIV, 92).

Nalopākhyāna ("the episode relating to Nala"), i.e. Nalopākhyānaparvan.—§ 10 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 321.—
§ 11 (do.): I, 2, 436.

[Nalopakhyanaparvan(ova)] ("the episode relating to Nala," the 35th of the minor parvans of the Mahābhārata; cf. Nalopākhyāna).- § 343: One day, when the Pandaras were grieving for Arjuna, Bhima asked Yudhishthira to permit him to go and slay Duryodhana, interpreting the time to be complete ("as in the Veda a day is often equivalent to a year, when passed in suffering") (krechratah), but he did not prevail upon Yudhishthira. While they were conversing the great rshi Brhadaçva came before them, and, asked by Yudhishthira if there was on earth a king more unfortunate than himself, he said that he would narrate a history of a prince more miserable than Yudhishthira, viz. Nala (the son of the Nishadha king Virasona), who, defeated deceitfully by Pushkara (the brother of Nala, v. 2296), dwelt in the woods with his spouse, having neither slaves nor chariots nor brothers nor friends with him (III, 52) .-§ 344: Brhadaçva suid: The Nishadha king Nala, the son of Virasena, was above all kings, etc., and fond of dice.

The Vidarbha king Bhima was granted by the Brahmarshi Damana a daughter, Damayanii, and three excellent sons, Dama, Danta, and Damana. Both Nala and Damayanti had not their equals in beauty, and, continually hearing of each other's virtues, they conceived attachment to each other, though they had never seen each other. Once Nala in his garden saw a number of golden-winged swans and caught one of them, but let it loose, as it promised to speak well of him before Damayanti. The swans having arrived at the Vidarbha country, the one who had been caught by Nala led Damayanti to a secluded spot and fulfilled its mission. Damayanti caused it to speak to Nala of her (III, 53).- § 345: As Damayanti became sick of love, her father invited all the kings to her evayamrara. At this time the rshis of the gods Narada and Parvata, having arrived in course of their wanderings at the regions of Indra, told him that the kings did not now come to him because they were intent on the evayamvara of Damayanti. Hearing this, the Lokapalas set out on their vehicles for the srayamvara, but seeing Nala on the way and filled with astonishment at his beauty, they left their chariots in the sky and asked Nala to be their messenger (III, 54). Nala promised to do so, but when Indra told him to go to Damayanti and tell her that Indra, Agni, Varuna, and Yama desired her to choose one of them for her lord, he asked them to spare him as he had come with the same object; but, as they insisted that he should stand by his promise, he by their power entered without being perceived by the guardians into the apartments of Damayanti, and, saying his name, fulfilled his mission (III, 55). Damayanti declared that if she did not become the wife of Nala himself she would resort to poison, or fire, or water, or the rope. Nala advised her to choose one of the gods, maintaining that having come in a different mission he dared not seek his own interest. Damayanti then told him to come to her svayamrara in company with the gods, then she would choose him, at which no blame would be his, and Nala returned to the Lokapalas and told them what had happened (III, 56). At the sacred hour of the holy lunar day of the auspicious season Bhima summoned the kings to the scayamvara, and that assembly of kings resembled the Bhogarati swarming with Nagas. Damayanti, beholding five persons all alike in appearance, and recollecting the marks of the celestials, of which she had heard from old people. was unable to distinguish which of them was Nala. Filled with grief, she then decided upon seeking the protection of the gods themselves, and prevailed upon them that they assumed their true shapes. Theroupon she beheld the gods unmoistened with perspiration, with unwinking eyes and unfuding garlands, not stained with dust, and staying without touching the ground, while Nala was revealed by his shadow, his fading garlands, and by his being stained with dust and sweat, and resting on the ground with winking eyes. She then chose Nala, seizing the hem of his garment and placing a floral wreath round his neck. Nala promised Damayanti that he would remain hers as long as he lived, and she spoke words of like import to him. The Lokapalas bestowed each a couple of boons on Nala: Indra, that he should be able to behold his divine nature in sacrifices, and blessed regions thereafter (gatim anuttamam); Agni, his own presence wherever he wished and regions as bright as himself; Yama, subtle taste in food and pre-eminence in virtue; Varuna, water wherever he desired and garlands of celestial fragrance.

Then the gods went to heaven and the kings returned home. Nala, after the wedding, stayed there for a time, returned home, ruled rightcously, and celebrated the horsesacrifice, etc. He begat the son Indrasona and the daughter Indrasena upon Damayanti (III, 57) .- § 316: When the Lokapalas were returning they met Dvapara with Kali going to the evayamvara, and Indra told Kali that Damayanti had already chosen Nala. As Kali threatened to avenge himself he was rebuked by the Lokapūlas, as Nala had studied the four Vedas with the Akhyana as the fifth, etc. When the gods had gone to heaven, Kali said that he would take possession of Nala and deprive him of his kingdom, and asked Dvapara to enter the dice (III. 58). Kali then went to the country of the Nishadhas and always watched for an opportunity. At last, in the twelfth year, when Nala, after answering a call of nature, touching water had said his twilight prayers without having washed his feet, Kali entered his person. Then Kali becoming Vrsha ("vrsho gavām," the principal die, Nil.) (PCR. thinks we ought to read that "Drapara also approached Pushkara becoming Vrsha") prevailed upon Pushkara, that he challenged Nala to a match of dice in order to acquire his kingdom. Nala and Pushkara gambled together for many months, Nala being always worsted; no one amongst his friends could succeed in dissuading him from the play; at last they came in a body, which was told by the sata to Damayanti, who in vain represented it to Nala; he uttered not a word in reply (III, 59). Seeing that Nala had lost everything, Damayanti told her nurse and maidservant Brhatsenā to summon the councillors in the name of Nala and tell them what had been lost; the councillors approached Nala, and Damayanti informed him that the citizens had come again in a body, but he regarded her not. She then caused Brhatsena to summon the sata l'arshneya, who at her request yoked Nala's favourite horses and brought her two children to Kundina (the city of Bhima, Nil.). There he left the children, the chariot, and the horses, and went to Ayodhyū, where he entered the service of king Riuparna (the king of Koçala, v. 2877) as a chariotecr (III, 60).—§ 347: At last, when Pushkara had won all Nala's wealth and his kingdom, he proposed to him to stake Damayanti. But Nala, feeling as if his heart would burst and gazing at Pushkara in anguish without speaking a word, took all the ornaments off his body, and attired in a single piece of cloth left the city accompanied by Damayanti. They stayed for three nights in the outskirts of the city, living on water alone. Nobody showed him hospitable regards, as I wishkara had. proclaimed through the city that he that should show any attention to Mala would be put to death. After many days Nala saw some birds of golden hue and covered them with his cloth in order to catch thom, but they rose up to the sky taking away that garment of his, and then told him they were the dice that had come hither to take away even his cloth. Nala proposed to Damayanti to leave him, pointing out to her the roads to Aranti, Rksharat, Vindhya, Payoshnī, Vidarbha, Koçala (C. Koçalam, B. and Bopp Koçalan), and the south. But she would not leave him, but suggested that they should go to Vidarbha (III, 61). Nala refused to appear before Bhima in his state of misery. They went on attired in the same piece of cloth. Once when Damayanti had fallen into a profound slumber in a shed for travellers (sabha), Nala, influenced by Kali, resolved upon deserting Damayanti, as separated from him she might perchance wander to her relatives. With a sword that he found near the shed he cut off one half of the cloth and throwing the instrument away departed, having first returned again and again, dragged away by Kali, but drawn back by love (III, 62). When Damayanti awoke, she lamented and cursed the being through whose imprecation Nala suffered woe, saying that it should lead a still more miserable life. Thereupon, wandering on, she was seized by a gigantic serpent and rescued by a hunter: as the hunter, after comforting her, tried to force her to love him, he was cursed by her and fell down lifeless upon the ground (III, 63). Description of the forest, Damayanti's lamentations. She went in a northerly direction for three days and nights, then she came to an asylum of ascetics, who told her that she should again become happy together with Nala. Then the asylum disappeared. Sometime afterwards, having proceeded a long way, she met with a body of merchants landing on the banks of a river; its leader was Cuci (v. 2529, "so help us now, Manibhadra, the king of Yakshas"). and it was bound for the city of the Cedi king Subahu (III, 64). Damayanti followed the caravan. Once, at midnight, the caravan was destroyed by wild elephants and many men were trodden to death, which some ascribed to their not having worshipped Manibhadra or Vuicrarana, the kings of Yakshas, others to their having received Damayanti, whom they thought to be a llakshasa or Picaca or Yaksha woman, and resolved upon killing her when they saw her. Hearing this Damayanti fled. The next day the remnant of the caravan left the place. Damayanti, with the brahmans that had survived the slaughter of the caravan, came towards evening to the city of the Codi king Subahu. The boys began to follow her; when she came before the palace of the king, the queen-mother let the nurse take her in. Damayanti agreed to stay there on the conditions that she should not eat remnants, not wash anyone's feet, nor speak with other men, but be protected against all aspirations. The queen gave her as a sairindhri to her daughter Sunanda (III, 65).- § 348: Nala, having deserted Damayanti, saw a conflagration in the forest and therefrom heard a voice calling him by name and saw the Naga Karkotaka, who, unable to stir, told him that he had deceived the great rshi Narada and been cursed by him with the words: "Stay thou here immobile until Nala takes thee hence, then thou shalt be freed from my curse," and asked him to deliver him and promised to instruct him in respect of his welfare. The snake then became as small as a thumb, and Nala taking him up went to a spot free from fire. Karkotaka let him proceed yet counting his steps, and bit him at the tenth step (adaçad daçame pade) (see Nil, and PCR.). Then the form of Nala was changed, in order that people might not recognize him, and Karkotaka assumed his own form. and said that Kali dwelling in Nala should be tortured by his venom, and that Nala should have no fear from animals with fangs, from enemies, and from men versed in the Veda (brchmavidbhyah), and told him to go to Ayodhya and present himself as a sala Bahuka before Rtuparna (of the race of Ikshvāku), who would give Nula his skill in dice (akshahrdaya) in exchange for Nala's knowledge of horses (acrahrdaya), and when he had become an adept at dice he should have prosperity and meet with his wife and children and regain his kingdom. The Naga king then gave Nala two pieces of celestial cloth, saying that when he desired to get back his own form he should remember him and wear this garment. Then he disappeared (III. 66),- $ 349: On the tenth day Nala entered the city of Rtuparna; he approached the king and named himself Bahuka, and said that he surpassed everybody in managing steeds and might be consulted in matters of difficulty (arthakrechreshu) and affairs of skill (naipuneshu), and that he was versed in the art of cooking. Then he was appointed superintendent of Rtuparna's horses on a pay of 10,000, and Varshneya and Jivala should be under his direction. Every evening he recited the cloka, "Where lies that helpless one (tapasvint) afflicted with hunger and thirst and worn with toil (cranta), or upon whom does she now wait (upatishthati)?" Once Itrala asked him who she was, and Nala related to him the main features of his story without naming her or himself (III, 67) .- § 350: Bhima sent out brahmans in all directions to search for Nala and Damayanti, promising 1,000 kine, etc., to him that should find them. At length the brahman Sudera, the friend of Damayanti's brother, recognized Damayanti in the city of the Codia, seated with Sunanda during the time of the king's prayers (punyāhacācane rājāah), and told her who he was and that her relatives and children were well. Beholding Damayanti weeping and conversing in private with Sudeva, Sunanda caused her mother to question Sudera (III, 68). Sudova told the story of Damayanti, and that he had recognized her by a mole between her eyebrows, which was now almost covered with dust as her whole body. Then Sunanda washed away the dust and the queen-mother recognized her by the mole as the daughter of her sister, as she and Damayanti's mother were both daughters of the Daçarna king Sudaman, and she herself had been bestowed on Vīrabāhu and her sister on Bhīma; she had witnessed Damayanti's birth in the palace of her father in the Daçarna country. At her own request Damaganti was brought in a litter carried by men and protected by a large escort to the city of Bhima, and was received with respect and worshipped the gods and brahmans. Bhima gave unto Sudera 1,000 kine, etc. The next day Damayanti let her mother cause Bhima to send brahmans out in all directions to seek for Nala. Damayanti ordered them everywhere to recite the clokus: "O beloved gambler, where hast thou gone, cutting off half of my garment," etc., but to take care that no one knew that it was on her command (III, 69). - § 351: After a long time the brahman Parnāda told that he had in Ayodkyā visited Bhāngāsuri (i.e. Rtuparna), and that Bahaka had been affected by hearing his cloka, and had said to him: "Chaste women, though overtaken by calamity, yet protect themselves," etc. Damayanti then thanked Parnada and promised him great wealth and consulted with her mother, and, without Bhima's knowing it, sent Sudera, who told Rtuparna that to-morrow Damayanti would hold another svayamvara (III, 70). When ordered by Rtuparna to conduct him to the trayamiara of Damayanti, Bahuka felt his heart bursting with grief, but promised to go there in a single day; he yoked four horses born in Sindha (description of their marks), made Varshneya sit on the chariot, and set out with so great speed that Vārshņega thought he must be Mātali or Cālihotra, who had taken a human shape, or Nala (III, 71).- § 352: As the chariot was coursing thus, Rtuparna lost his upper garment, and Nala declared that it was impossible to recover it, as they had already travelled one yojana thence. As Ringarma rightly indicated the number of fruits of a vibhitaka-tree (Terminalia bellerica), and said he was skilled in dicc as in numbers, Nala prevailed upon him to teach him the science and in future receive instead his science of horses. Then Kali came out from the body of Nala, vomiting the poison of Karkotaka, and assumed his own shape, as the fire of Damayanti's curse had left him, but remained invisible to others except Nala. Kali prevailed upon Nala that he should not curse him, promising that those men who would attentively recite his history should be free from fear of him, and entered the ribhitaka-tree till Nala had gone far away. Then Kali returned to his abode. From the touch of Kali the vibhitaka-tree from that hour fell into disrepute. Nala now became free from calamity, though he did not assume his original form (III, 72) -§ 353: At night they arrived at Kundina, having passed 100 yojanas. The steeds of Nala that were in that city, and peacocks and elephants and Damavanti recognized the sound of Nala's chariot; Damayanti ascended the terrace with the desire of seeing Nala. The Koçala king (Rtuparna) wondered, as he did not hear any talk of the svayamvara, etc., and Bhima thought that he had come simply to pay his respects. When Rtuparna had gone to his appointed quarters with Vārshneya, and Bāhuka, having tended the horses, was sitting at the side of the chariot, Damayanti sent a female messenger in search of Nala (III, 73). The female messenger Keçini asked Bahuka about Varshneya and himself; he said that Varshneya was the chariotecr of Nala, that nobody knew Nala except Nala himself and his wife, as he did not discover his marks of identity anywhere, and that he himself was the charioteer and cook of king Rtuparna; at last she repeated the cloka of Parnada: "O beloved gambler," etc., and said that Damayanti wished again to hear the reply he had given Parņāda; then Rāhuka, weeping, said: "Chaste women, though overtaken by calamity," etc., and Keçini went to Damayanti and acquainted her with everything (III, 74). Damayanti again sent Keçini to stay in silence at Bahuka's side and mark his conduct; she related that low passages grew in height so that he might pass through them easily, that when he approached narrow holes opened wide, that only by his looking upon them the vessels became filled with water, that when he held a handful of grass in the sun the fire blazed up all of a sudden, that he touched fire and was not hurt, that water falling at his will flowed in a stream, and that flowers pressed with his hands became gaver and more fragrant than before. Damayanti then caused Keçinî without Bahuka's knowledge to bring her some meat that had been boiled and dressed by him, from the kitchen, and recognized the taste. She then sent her two children with Keçini. Bahuka embraced them crying aloud, saving they were like his own children, and sent Keçini away lest people might think "evil" (III, 75). Having obtained the consent both of her father and mother, Damayanti caused Nala to be brought to her apartments; it came to an explication; Damayanti declared that she had feigned to hold a second svayamrara because no one except Nala could in one day manage 100 yojanas with horses, and swore by the Air, Sun, and Moon ("who dwells as a witness within every creature," v. 2989), who had been her protector for these three years, and Vayu bore witness to the truth of her words. Then a floral shower fell there, and the celestial kettledrum began to play. Nala then wore the garment he had received from the serpent king and regained his old form. Thus Nala in the fourth year was reunited with his wife (III, 76). The next day they presented themselves before Bhima. The citizens were in great joy and adorned (arcitani) the temples (devatayatanani), etc. Rtuparna asked Nala's forgiveness, and Nala also asked Rtuparna's forgiveness, and made over to him his horselore, having obtained from him the mystery of dice. Then Riupurna went away to his own city, employing another person as his charioteer (III, 77).- § 354: Having dwelt for a month at Kundina, Nala set out for the Nishadha country with a single white chariot, sixteen elephants, fifty horses, and 600 infantry, and proposed to Pushkara that they should gamble again, as Nala had won great wealth: the stake should be Damayanti, wealth and kingdom, and their lives; if not, he proposed a single combat. Pushkara, hoping to win Damayanti, whom he loved, gladly consented to gamble, and lost at a single throw. Nala, declaring that it was Kali who had done it all, forgave his brother and granted him his portion, and after a month let him go to his own town. All the citizens and subjects rejoiced at Nala's return (III, 78). Then Nala with a large force brought Damayanti and his children home. and passed his days in joy and performed numerous sacrifices with abundant gifts to brahmans. - § 355: "So thou also, O Yudhishthira, wilt blaze forth in effulgence soon. They that will repeatedly recite this history of Nalu and they that will hear it recited will never be touched by adversity." As Yudhishthira feared that some one skilled in dice might summon him, Brhadacra taught him the science of dice (akshahrdaya) and then went to Acvaciras for a bathe. Yudhishthira then learnt from brahmans and ascetics from various directions that Arjuna was still engaged in ascetic penances, and Yudhishthira grieved for him (III, 79).

[Nāradāgamanaparvan] ("the section containing the arrival of Narada," the ninety-seventh of the minor parvans of Mahabharata; cf. Naradagamana). - § 792 : Vaiçampāyana said: Two years after their return from the retreat of Dhrtarashtra the Pandaras were visited by D.-r. Narada. Yudhishthira inquired after Dhytarashtra, etc. Narada said: After thy return from Kurukshetra, Dhrtarashtra proceeded towards Gungadvara with the sacrificial fire and Gandhari, Kuntī, Sanjaya, and all the yajakas. They themselves took to severe austerities (description), while the sacred fire was duly worshipped by the yajakas. They wandered about, Sanjaya acting as a guide, Prtha becoming the eye of Gandhari. Once Dhrtarashtra bathed in the Ganga, and was returning to his retreat. A violent forest conflagration set in; Dhrtarashtra dismissed Sanjaya and sat down, facing the east, with Gandhari and Kunti; they concentrated their soul, and were burnt by the conflugration. Sanjaya escaped and was seen by me (Narada) on the banks of the Ganga in the midst of ascetics; he bade them farewell and started for Himarat. In the course of my wanderings I saw the three bodies. The ascetics, from whom I heard all the details, did not at all grieve for them. Vaicampayana said: The Pandaras and the citizens felt great grief (XV, 37). Yudhishthira lamented (a) (XV, 38). Narada comforted Yudhishthira by informing him of the sacred character of the fire that had burnt Dirtarashtra and the two queens. When Dirtarashtra entered the woods he caused his sacrificial fires to be duly ignited; having performed his sucred rites with them he abandoned them all; then the Yajakas had left them in a solitary part of the wood and gone away; the fires thus left to themselves produced a general conflagration; "this is what I have heard from the ascetics on the Ganga."

Vaicampayana said: Headed by Yuyutsu the Pandaras and the citizens all proceeded to the Ganga in order to offer oblations of water to the deceased king and queens. Then they came back, taking up their residence outside the city. Yudhishthira sent a number of men to the retreat to cremate the remains of his uncle, aunt, and mother in due form. On the twelfth day he performed the craddhas with gifts in abundance (description). Then all returned to Hastinapura. The great R. Narada, having comforted Yudhishthira, went away. Dhrtarāshtra had passed three years in the forest and fifteen years in the city. Yudhishthira was plunged in grief [*; not in B.] (XV, 39).

[Nārada-Parvatopākhyāna(m)] ("the episode relating to Narada and Parvata"). § 633b (Rajadh.): R. Narada and his sister's son Parvata had in days of old left heaven for a pleasant ramble on earth in order to taste clarified butter and rice. They wandered under a compact of telling each other their inmost thoughts. They arrived at the court of Srnjaya ( Cvaitya). Narada was taken with the charms of Srnjaya's daughter Sukumārī; but shamefulness prevented him from disclosing his love to Parvata, who then cursed him for his reticence, saying that Sukumārī should become his wife, but then she and every man should behold him in the shape of an ape. Narada cursed Parvata in return, saying that he should not succeed in proceeding to heaven. Parcata began to wander over the earth. Sukumārī beheld Narada as an ape, but devoted herself entirely to him, and did not desire any D., Mu., or Y. for a husband. Narada and Parvata, after some time, became reconciled and withdrew their mutual curses. Sukumārī fled, thinking Nārada to be somebody else, but was informed by Parrata. Parrata proceeded to heaven and Narada to his home. Krshna continued: "R. Narada is here; he will tell thee everything that happened" (XII, 30).

Nara-Nārāyaṇau. §561d (Yānasandhip.): Once lighaspati and Uganas went to Brahman, and also the Marats with India, the Vasus with Agni, the Adityas, the Sadhyas, the seven rshis (saptarshayah), the Gandharra Vicravasu, the gapar of Apsarases, and having bowed down to Brahman they sat around him. Just then the two ancient deities (parvaderau), the Rshis Nara and Narayana, left the place. Brhaspati said to Brahman: "Who are these two that leave the place without worshipping thee?" Brahmán said that they were Nara and Narayana who had come from the world of men to the world of Brahmán (so Nīl.); "worshipped by the gods and the Gundharras they exist only for the destruction of the Asuras." Indra went to the spot where those two were practising austerities, accompanied by all the gods he aded by Brhaspati. At that time the gods had been very much alarmed in consequence of a war with the Asuras. Indra obtained the boon that Nara and Narayana (i.e. Arjuna and Krshna) assisted him in the battle (cf. Arjuna). Both of them, by their acts, enjoy numerous eternal and celestial regions, and are repeatedly born in the times of war. Even this is what Nārada, conversant with the Vedas, had said to the Vrshnis.

For some purpose that creator of the universe took his birth as the son of Dharma. On Himavat he underwent austerities for 66,000 years (description) and then for twice that period, and thus he became Bráhman (brahmabhūtaḥ) and beheld the supreme denty Civa (c). The lotus-eyed N. recited a hymn to Mahadrea (i.e. Civa) (given in full) (\$\cup\$). Civa then granted him boons, that neither gods nor the Asuras; the mahoragas, the Piçacas, the Gandharvas, men, the Rakshasas, the birds, the Nagas, nor any creatures in the universe should ever be able to withstand his prowess, "thou shalt be superior to myself if thou ever goest to battle with me." Even that god then walked over the earth (as Krshna Väsudeva), beguiling the universe by his illusive power. From the austerities of N. was born a great muni Nara, who was equal to N. himself. Arjuna was none else than that Nara. [Nārāyanāstramokshaparvan(°va)] ("the section including the hurling of the Narayana weapon"), the 78th of the minor parvans of the Mhbhr. § 603. THE LAST PART OF THE 15TH DAY. After the fall of Drong, the Rurus, even Duryodhana, etc. (a), fled away, Krtavarman with the remnant of his Bhoja troops, etc. (B), Sugarman with the remnant of the Samçaptakas. Only Açratthaman did not flee: Açvatthaman & Çıkhandın, etc. (7). Açvatthaman usked Duryodhana why the troops were fleeing away, even Karna's troops; Duryodhena caused Krpa to inform Agratthaman of the truth (2), at which Accatthaman was filled with rage (VII, 193). Dhṛtarāshtra asked Sanjaya what Agrattheman said ( $\epsilon$ ), he who knew the weapons of men and Vāruņa, etc. (ζ) (VII, 194). Sanjaya related: Agratthaman complained before Duryodhana that his father has been killed  $(\eta)$ , and vowed to destroy the Pañcalas and the Pandaras; neither D., nor G., As., U., Ra., etc., were able to vanquish him; there were none equal to him and Arjuna in knowledge of weapons; he had a weapon (the Närayana weapon) that neither Arjuna, etc. (0) knew, given by Narayana to his father as a boon, with the promise that no man should ever be his equal in battle; only, this weapon must never be used in haste, etc., and never be hurled upon persons that abandon their chariots or weapons in battle, etc.; with this he would rout and slay the Pandaras, etc. (1). The Kuru army rallied; many blow their conches, etc.; the Pandaras took counsel of one another; Açvatthaman touched water and invoked the Nardyana, weapon (VII, 195). Fierce omens in nature appeared. D., Da., and G. became inspired with fear. Dhrtarashtra asked Sanjaya what counsel was adopted by the Pandaras in order to protect Dhrshtadyumna on seeing the retreating Kauracas once more advance to battle, rallied by Aquatthaman. Sanjaya related: Yudhishthira spoke about the matter to Arjuna (x), fearing that it was Indra himself who was approaching for the sake of the Kauracas. Arjuna in reply described the prowess of Acvatthaman and the unrighteousness of the Pandaras in slaying Drona ( $\lambda$ ); "all of us have passed the greater part of our lives; the days that remain to us are few; this exceedingly unrighteous act has stained that remnant"; "I did not interfere, as he was about to be slain; for this fault I have already sunk into hell, overcome with shame"

(VII, 196). Bhimasena, reproaching Arjuna, viudicated the deed (µ); "I can, with my arrows, rout the united D. with Indra at their head, and As., U., and men." Then Dhrehtadyumna spoke in justification of his conduct (i) (VII, 197). Asked by Dhrtarachtra (ξ), Sanjaya related: All the other persons present remained silent; Arjuna, glancing obliquely towards Dhrshtadyumna, seemed to reproach him with tears and sighs; Yudhishthira, etc. (a) stood ashamed; Satyaki wrathfully rebuked Dhrshtadyumna (#). Dhrshtadyumna in reply taunted Satyaki with the slaughter of Bhuricraras (p). Satyaki rushed towards Dhrshtadyumna in order to slay him; Bhima, urged by hirshna, held him back; Sahadeva endeavoured to bring about a reconciliation (σ); Dhrahtadyumna asked Bhīma to let him slav Sātyakı (7); then he or Arjuna would slay the enemies. Krshna and Yudhishthira restored peace with great difficulty, and all the warriors proceeded to battle (VII, 198). Agrathaman caused a great carnage among the Pandara troops (description); before Duryodhana he repeated his vow (v). Duryodhana rallied his troops. Accatthaman invoked the Narayana weapon (description). The Pandaras, etc. ( $\phi$ ), became exceedingly agitated. Yudhishthira, relying on Krshna, advised Dhrshfadyumna to flee away with his Pañcalas, and Satyaki with the Vrshnis and Andhakas; he and his brothers would ascend a funeral pile  $(\chi)$ . Arshna prevailed upon the troops to lay down their weapons and alight from their chariots. Bhimasena alone refused to do so, and dissuaded the others (4). Ariuna said that his vow was that the Gandiva should not be used against the Narayana weapon, kine, and brahmans. Bhima attacked Accatthaman, but was overwhelmed by the energy of the Nardyana weapon (VII, 199). Arjuna covered Bhimasena with the Varuna wedpon; Arjuna and Krshna, alighting from their chariot, proceeded on foot towards Bhima and forcibly brought him down from his chariot, making him abandon his weapons. Then the Narayana weapon became neutralized; all the quarters became clear, etc. The Pandava host stood arrayed once more. Duryodhana urged Accatthaman to use the same weapon once more; Accatthaman said that it could not be used twice; if brought back it would without doubt slay himself. Duryodhana then urged him to slay the enemies with other weapons. Dhytarashtra asked, what then cume to pass (w); Sanjaya reinted: Dhrshtadyumna & Acratthaman, who deprived Dhrshtadyumna of his steeds, driver, and chariot; the Pañcalas fled away. Satyaki & Acratthaman, who was worsted by him. Duryodhana, etc. (aa), & Sālyaki, who made them flee away deprived of their chariots. Açratthāman (upon another chariot) & Sātyaki, who once more deprived him of his chariot and caused him to retreat; the Pandaras blew their conches, and Satyaki slew 300 of Vrahasen.'s division, etc. (aa, Acratthaman (upon another chariot) & Sātyaki; Açvatthāman repeated his vow (BB); Sātyaki was carried away by his driver. Accatthaman & Dhrehtadyumna, who was much afflicted; Arjuna, etc. (γγ), & Agratthāman, who slew Sudarçana (the Mālava king), Paurava (Brhatkshattra), and the young Cede prince. Bhima & Accatthaman; Bhima was carried away by his steeds; the Pancalas fled away (VII, 200). Arjuna (+ Krshna) (rallying his troops) & Acvatthaman (+ the Kauravas); Arjuna addressed Acvatthaman in harsh words (ĉô). Dhṛtarāshṭra asked Sañjaya about the cause of this, as Arjuna and Acvatthuman loved each other. Sanjaya said that it was in consequence of his grief (ee). Accethaman became angry with Ariuna and especially with Krehna. touched water, and made use of the Agneya weapon, from which dire omeus in nature appeared, and a great slaughter in the Pandara army resulted; Ra, and Pc, uttered fierce cries, ore (description). Arjuna invoked the Brahma weapon: the darkness was dispelled, etc.; a full akshauhini of the Pandara troops had been killed; Krshna and Arjuna were unwounded; the Pandacas rejoiced, the Kauraras wondered, Accepthaman was disconsolate, and ran away from the fight; he met Vyāsa, and asked him the reason; "neither As., nor G, Pc., Ra., U., Y., and birds, nor men can baffle this weapon." Vyāsa told him the story of Nārāyana (b); Nara and Narayana are Arjuna and Krshna; even Accatthaman has been born as a portion of Rudra, and was in a former birth | endued with great wisdom, regarding the universe to consist only of Mahadeva, etc., and Civa had granted him numerous boons, and he had, in every Yuga, adored the great god in his Phallic form. Krshna had sprung from Rudra himself, and always worshipped him, regarding his Phallic emblem as the origin of the universe, and he viewed the identity of Brahman with the universe; D., Si., and M.-r. adore Krshna in order to attain to Muhadeva: Krshna is the Creator of everything; the eternal Krshua should be adored with sacrifices, etc. Acratthaman bowed unto Rudra, regarded Krshna as worthy of the highest regards, and became filled with delight, the marks whereof appeared on his body. Bowing to Vyāsa, he caused the army to be withdrawn, and so did also the Pandavas. Having fought for five days . . . , Drona repaired to Brahmalska (VII, 201). Arjuna met with Vyāsa and inquired of him about the invisible person who aided him in the battle; Vyāsa said that it was Mahadera himself, and recited a long enumeration of his attributes (49); if Mahadera becomes angry, neither D., nor As, G., Ra, even if they hide themselves in deep caves, can have peace. In days of yore Mahadera destroyed the sacrifice of Daksha; the Sacrifice fled away, and D. and As, fell down and submitted to Mahadera, the Nagas and R. became agitated, etc.; Pāshan was eating the purodāça: Cira tore out his teeth; the gods assigned to Rudra a substantial share in sacrifices; he then re-established the sacrifice. Then I yasa related the destruction of Tripura (d). He  $\lceil Cira \rceil$  is Rudra, etc. (a). Explanation of some of the names of Mahadeva (KK). Blessings upon the reader, especially the readers of the Catarudriya (\lambda\lambda) (VII, 202).

Nārāyaņā ("the daughter of Nārāyaņa"?) = Indrasenā:: III. 10093 (I°); IV, 651 (I°).

Nārāyanīya, adj. ("relating to Nārāyana"). § 717b (Nārāyanīya): XII, 347, 13442 (°m ākhyānam, i.e. Nārāyanīya).

[Nārāyaṇīya(m)] ("the section treating of Nārāyaṇa"): § 717b (Mokshadh.). Bhīshma said: "I heard it from my father that in the Kṛta age, during the epoch of Manu Srāyambhwa, the eternal Nārāyaṇa, the Soul of the universe, took birth as the son of Dharma in a quadruple form: as Nara, Nārāyaṇa, Hari, and the Solf-existent (Srayambhwah!) Kṛshṇa. Amongst them all, Nārāyaṇa and Nāra piactised the several austerities, repairing to the Himālayan hermitage Badarī and riding in their golden chariot description; v. the note of PCR., p. 740). Nārada dropped down on Gandhamādana from a summit of Mēru and wandered over all the world, and at last repaired to Badarī at the hour of Nara's and Nārāyaṇa's performing their daily rites. He said to himself: this is truly the abode of that Being in whom are established all the worlds including D., As., G., K., and M.-U.; in this spot Arshna and Hari dwelt formerly; what is that deity whom these two worship? who are these Pitrs whom these two Pitrs of all beings adore?" R. Narada, bowing unto Mahadeva, praised Narayana ("sung in the Vedas, Puranas, Angas, and Upangas"), and asked what god or Pitr he was sacrificing to. Narayana said that about this topic nothing should be said, as it was an ancient mystery; but because of his devotion he instructed him about Kshetrajau, etc. The twenty-one Prajapatis: Brahmán, etc. (a) were first born, and obeyed the eternal law of the Supreme God (XII, 335). Narada (Parameshthya) proceeded to Cretadvipa ("White Island") to behold Narayana in his original shape; by yoga he soared into the firmament, rested for a short while on a summit of Meru, then he directed his eyes towards the north-west, and north of the milky ocean he saw the large island Cvetadripa, more than 32,000 yojanas from Meru; the inhabitants of that realm have no senses, etc. (description); they are white and free from every sin, etc. Yudhishthira usked for further information about this people. Bhishma related the story of Uparicara (c), "the essence of all narratives," which he had heard from his father (XII, 336-8). Arrived at Cretadripa, Norada stood in yoga and hymned Narayana (ζ) [i.e. Mahāpurushastava] (XII, 339). Narayana showed himself to Narada, bearing all forms (vicearapadhrk; enumeration), uttering with his mouths Gayatri, on, and the Aranyaka, and the four Vedas; he mentioned Ekata, Drita, and Trita, and instructed Narada (1). Vasudeva = Soul = Jiva = Cesha = Sankarshana(when he takes birth as Jira) = Kshetrajna; > Sanatkumāra = Mind = Pradyumna; > the Creator = Annuddha = Içana = Igrara = Ahankara. "I am known as Purusha; without acts I am the 25th. Heranyagarbha, etc. (0), are in the." Nārāyaņa's boons to Brahman in days of yore. "I am Kapila, etc. (1). Brahmán springs from Aniruddha's navel.' The feats that Narayana will perform (those that he will slay; his incurnations) (x); "in the Trota age I shall take birth as Rama of Phrgu's race . . . ; in the twilight (sandhyāmçs) between Tretā and Drapara I shall take birth as Rama Daçarathi; at that time Ekata and Deita (in consequence of their injury to Trita) will have to take birth as apes; all those apes shall become my allies . . . ; in the period (sandhau) joining the Dvapara and the Kali I shall take birth in Mathura in order to slay Kamsa, and take up my residence in Kuçasthulī [at] Drārakā; I shali transplant Pragjyotisha to Dvaraka, and subjugate Mahoçvara and Mahasena (i.e. Skanda), who will help Da. Bana (with 1,000 arms); . . . Brahmán himself never obtained a sight of me in this shape of mine, which thou hast seen to-day." Hart then disappeared; Narada returned to Badari, to behold Nara and Narayana. This great Upanishad, consistent with the four Vedas and with Sankhya-Yoga, and called Pancaratra, and recited by Narayana himself, was repeated by Narada in the abode of Brahman. Yudhishthira asked: "Was not Brahman acquainted with this wonderful narrative of the glory of Narayana?" Bhishma said that it was only to R. in the abode of Brahman that Narada recited his narrative. The propagation of the narrative: R. > Sarya > 66,000 R. in Surya's train, etc., > D. on Meru > Asita > the Pitrs; AI heard it from my father Cantanu; it is a Purana, and should not be communicated to anyone that is not 518 [Närāyaṇīya(ṃ).]

a worshipper of Vasudeva; it is really the essence of the hundreds of other narratives thou hast heard from me; in days of yore, D. and As., uniting together, churned the ocean for the amria; after the same manner, the brahmans in days of yore, uniting together, churned all the scriptures and raised this narrative." He who reads this becomes an inhabitant of Cvetadvīpa, etc.—Vaiçampāyana said: Yudhishthira and all his brothers became devoted to Nārāyaṇa; Vyāsa visited (through the sky) the ocean of milk (which is always the abode of nectar), and worshipping the great God there, he came back to his own hermitage. Bhishma said: "I have now repeated the narrative that was recited to Narada; that narrative has descended from person to person from very ancient times; I heard it from my father."-Sala said: "I have now told you all that Vaiçampāyana recited to Janamejaya. King Janamejaya properly discharged all his duties according to the scriptures. You have all undergone severe penances, etc.; residing in this sacred Naimisha forest, ye are . . . conversant with the Vedas, . . . ye have come to this sacrifice of Caunaka; do ye all adore . . . Nārāyana. I heard this excellent narrative, that has descended from generation to generation, from my father in former times" (XII, 340) .- Caunaka asked about pravrtti and nivrtti, etc. Sauti recited the discourse of Vaicampayana to Janamejaya. Janamejaya said that the whole world with Brahmán, D., As., and men are deeply attached to acts; Brahmán, etc. ( $\lambda$ ), have adopted the religion of pravrtti. Vaicampayana said that this question related to a deep mystery, and that it required penances and acquaintance with the Puranas; he recited what M.-r. Vydsa said to his disciples Sumantu, etc. (µ) (as he used to teach them the four Vedas and Mahabharata as the fifth), on Meru (inhabited by Si. and Ca.); Narayana had been gratified by his penances on the shore of the ocean of milk, and he had, with the eye of knowledge, beheld all that occurred in the beginning of the Kalpa: Mahā-Purusha or Paramātmā (according to both Sānkhya aud Yoga) > Avyakta (Pradhāna) > Aniruddha (mahān ātmā, Ahankara) > Pitamaha (i.e. Brahman); from Ahankara have sprung the five elements (mahābhūtāni); Marīci, etc. (v), are the eight Prakrtis, upon whom all the worlds depend; Brahmán created them with the Vedas, Vedangas, etc.; Rudra (from the principle of wrath) > ten Rudras: these eleven Rudras = Vikārapurushāh . . . Brahmán with the R. Prakrtis, and D.-r. repaired to the northern shore of the ocean of milk and practised the penances named mahaniyama (declared by Brahmán in the Vodas) for 1,000 celestial years (description); then Hari spoke to them, saying that he would invest them with pravrtti. They performed a sacrifice in honour of Vishņu according to the ordinances laid down for the Krta age. The great god was pleased and said that their pravrtti should be fraught with ends whence there will be return; "Marioi, etc.  $(\xi)$ , the seven R. who are manasah (spiritual sons of Brahman) will become the preceptors of the Vedas, wedded to the religion of pravrtti, and created for procreating offspring (Prajapatyo); . . . Sana, etc. (o), these seven R. who are spiritual (mānasāh) sons of Brahmán, and whose knowledge comes to them of itself, are wedded to the religion of niertti, conversant with Yoga and Sankhya, and cause the religion of nivrtti to flow in the worlds. Kshetrajña is myself . . . Brahman's son Rudra has sprung from his brow at his command . . . In the Krta-yuga living creatures should not be slain in the sacrifices; in the Treta-yuga animals, dedicated with mantras, will be slain in the sacrifices; then comes the mixed (micrah) yuga Drapara; then Tishya with Kali in the van." Vyasa continued: D. and R. went away. Only Brahmán remained, desirous of beholding the great god, then residing in the form of Aniruddha; the god then showed himself to Brahman with a vast equine head, etc. (description) saying that at times he would appear in incarnate forms. Then he disappeared, and Brahmán proceeded to his own region. "Do you bow to him who is the lord of the Rudras, etc. (#)." Blessing upon the reader (XII, 341). Janamejaya inquired of the meaning of the different names of Narayana; Vaicampayana related what Keçava (Krshna) had said to Phalguna (Arjuna). when the latter asked him about the signification of his names mentioned by M.-r. in the Vedas and the Puranas. Kṛshṇa said: In the Ryreda, etc. (ρ), many are the names that have been mentioned by M.-r.; "from Narayana's [as Aniruddha] grace has arisen Brahman, and from his wrath has arisen Rudra"; description of Rudra (σ); "I adored in days of yore the ancient Rudra for obtaining the boon of a son; Brahmán, etc. (7), adore Hari Nardyana (Vishnu)." Etymology of Narayana, etc. (v); "R Trita, the eldest (adyah) son of Brahmán, when thrown into a well by Elata and Drita, invoked me as Prenigarbha and was rescued from the pit; Dirghatamas (§ 170) invoked me as Keçara, became cured of his blindness, and then came to be called Gotama (v. Nil.); Agni and Soma, blending together, became transfused in one and the same substance (ekayonitram agatah) . . . , in the Purana this is said, and further that the gods have Agni for their mouth" (XII, 342). Asked by Arjuna about the unity of nature of Agni and Soma, Krshna related this ancient story: I) When only the infinite water (quotation of the cruti) exists (called tamas), Brahman > Purusha > Brahman, who caused Agni (the kshatra) and Soma (brahman, i.e. the brahmans) to spring from his own eyes (quotation of the cruti relating to Agni); Agni is the hotr and the brahman of the sacrifice; he who offers food in the mouth of a brahman is said to pour libations into the sacred fire for gratifying the deities (quotation from Catapatha-brahmana); in this way brahmans have come to be regarded as Agni. Agni is again Vishnu (quoting Sanatkumara).-II) By Gautama's curse (for his assault on Ahalyā), Indra got a green beard; through the curse of Kauçika, Indra lost his testicles and got those of a ram.—III) As Indra with uplifted thunderbolt would prevent the Acvins from receiving a share in sacrifice (graha-), Cyarana paralysed his arms.—IV) Incensed at the destruction of his sacrifice, Daksha by his austerities caused a third eye to appear on the forehead of Rudra.-V) When Rudra would destroy Tripura, Uçanas tore a matted lock from his head and hurled it at ·Rudra, whence serpents began to bite Rudra, whose throat became blue, just as in the Svayambhuva Manvantara, when Narayana seized Rudra by the throat.-VI) When Angiras Brhaspati sat [on the shores of the ocean] to make preparation for the churning in order to raise the amrta and touched water (upasprçatah), the water was not clear (na prasadam gatavatyah); he became angry and [cursed] the ocean, saying: "From this day thou shalt be tainted with fisher, etc."-VII) Viçvarapa Triçiras Trashtra was the purchita of the gods; he was the sister-son of the Asuras; while publicly offering to the deities he secretly offered shares to the Asuras; the Asuras with

Hiranyakacipu at their head prevailed upon him through his mother, that he (who had come to the Nandana wood) should aid Hiranyakaçipu, who was cursed by Hairanyagarbha Vasishtha, saying: "Since thou hast chosen another hotr. thy sacrifice shall not be completed, and thou shalt be slain by a hitherto unknown kind of being." Victorapa performed austere tapas; Indra sent Apsarases, of whom Viçvarūpa became chamoured, and he promised to destroy Indra and the gods; he uttered mantras by which he grew; with one mouth he drank all the some that was offered to the gods by the brahmans in all the worlds; with one [he ate] food; with one [he drank the energy of all] the gods, including Indra. These repaired to Brahmán (so B.; Brahmanam, C.), and according to his counsel they prevailed upon R. Bhargava Dadhica, that he should abandon his body by his yoga power; his bones Dhatr shaped into a thunderbolt (vajra), which was pervaded by the energy of Vishnu; with this vaira Indra struck Vicrarupa, and severed the heads from the body. By the pressing (mathana) of his limbs Vrtra came into existence. whom Indra slew. Terrified with the double brahmanicide, Indra abandoned the sovereignty of the gods; he entered a cool lotus-stalk in the Manasa lake, and becoming very minute (anumatrah) by his yoga power (aicrarya-yogat) he entered the fibres of that lotus-stalk. Now rajas and tamas assailed the deities; the mantras of M.-r. lost their efficacy (na pravartanta), Ra. appeared; the Vedas (Brahma) were about to disappear (utsādanam jagāma); without an Indra, the worlds lost their strength and became easy to overwhelm. Then the gods and Rehis crowned Ayus' son Nahusha as king of the gods. Nahusha ruled over heaven with 500 luminaries on his forehead, which had the virtue of robbing the energy of every creature. Then follows, somewhat abbreviated, the contents of § 555 (Indra) = V, 11 foll.—VIII) In days of yore, when M.-r. Bharadraja was saying his prayers (updsprçat) on the shore of the celestial Ganga, he was approached by Vishnu, who was taking his three strides; Vishnu, struck with water by Bharadvaja on the breast, received a mark [i.e. Crivatsa] on his breast.—IX) Cursed by M.-r. Bhrgu, Agni was obliged to become a devourer of all things .-X) Aditi cooked food for the gods to strengthen them so that they might slay the Asuras; there Budha [i.e. the planet Mercury], after completing a vow (rratacarya-), came and asked for alms of Aditi; but she, intending that only the gods should cat it first, gave him no alms. At this Budha (Brahmabhūtah) cursed Aditi, saying that she would have a pain (ryatha) in her womb; in the second birth (as an egg) of Virasrat, the egg of [his] mother Aditi [was] killed (so B.); [therefore] Virasvat Craddhadeva [became] Marttanda.-XI) Daksha had sixty daughters, of whom he gave thirteen to Kaçyapa, ten to Dharma, ten to Manu, and twenty-seven (the Nukshatras) to Soma; although the latter were all alike in respect of beauty, etc., yet Soma became more attached to Robins, and was cursed by Daksha, etc., cf. § 615 (Prubhāsotpattikathana) = IX, 35; Prabhāsa in the western ocean was originally called Hiranyasaras; from this curse also have come the dark spots in the disc of the moon, exhibiting the mark of a bare. - XII) M.-r. Sthulaciras practised austerities on the north-eastern side of Meru; a breeze, charged with all delicious perfumes, gratified him; the trees around him [from jealousy] put forth their flowers to make a display; he cursed them, saying that they should not have flowers at all times.—XIII) Narayana, in days of yore, for the good of the world, became M.-r. Vadarāmukha; practising austerities on Moru, he summoned the ocean; but it did not come; he then, with the heat of his body. evaporated its water and caused it to become as saltish in taste as the human sweat; it should cease to be drinkable; only to Vadavāmukha it should be sweet, when he drinks it; therefore, to this day, the water from the ocean is drunk only by Vadavāmukha, who lives within it (anuvartina).-XIV) Umd, the daughter of the mountain Himavat, was desired in marriage by Rudra; M. r. Bhrgu, was refused, and therefore he brought about that Himarat ceased to abound with jewels and gems. Even such is the glory of the brahman. [Almost the whole of the preceding part of this chapter is in prose. - Etymologies of Urshikeça, etc. (φ); R. Yāska, having adored me by the name of Cipivishta, succeeded in restoring (abhijagmivan) the Nirukta, which had disappeared into the nether regions (adho nashfam). Other identifications with Narayana  $(\chi)$ ; R. Pañcala, etc.  $(\psi)$ , aided by Narayana: etymology of Dharmaja, etc. (w).—Asked by Arjuna about that battle between Rudra and Narayana, Krehna related: All the universe became suddenly filled with anxiety, etc. (aa); peace was brought about by Brahmán; the mark made by Rudra's lance on Nārāyana's cheek should assume the form of a beautiful whirl, and Rudra should be called Crikantha from the mark of Narayana's hand on his throat.— The two R. Nara and Narayana then made friends with Rudra, and, dismissing the gods, once more set themselves to penances. "In this way, O son of Kunti! assuming diverse forms do I rove at will through the earth, Brahmaloka, and the high and eternal region of felicity called Goloka. That being, whom, at the time of all thy battles, thou beheldest stulking in thy van, is no other than Rudra; . . . those foes whom thou hast slain, were all, in the first instance, slain by him" (XII, 343). Caunaka asked, why Narada, having seen the Supreme Lord in the form of Aniruddha, again proceeded so quickly to Nara and Narayana. Sauti said: At an interval in his snake-sacrifice, Janamejaya addressed his great-grandfather Vyāsa, asking him this same question, etc.  $(\beta\beta)$ . Vaiçampāyana answered: Leaving Cvetadvipa, Narada quickly proceeded to Meru, full of wonder, thence to Gandhamadana, and, traversing the sky, to Badari, where he saw the R. [Nara and Narayana], engaged in penances, both with Crivatsa and matted locks. both with "the swan's foot" on their palms, etc., each of them with four mushkas (v. the note of PCR., p. 822), sixty teeth, and four arms, etc. (description), and told them what he had seen at Cvetadvipa, and that the marks of Nara and Nardyana were the same that he had seen on the Supreme Soul; "that realm, where he resides, the Sun warms not, etc.; having constructed an altar, measuring eight fingers' breadth, he is practising penances there, standing on one foot, etc.; whatever libations . . . are poured on the sacrificial fire by R., etc.  $(\gamma\gamma)$ , all reach the feet of that great deity" (XII, 344). Discourse of Nara and Nārāyaņa to Nārada about Nārāyaņa; "Sūrya is said to be the door [through which the emancipate must pass]; entering Surya, their bodies are consumed by his fire: they then become invisible . . . ; reduced to invisible atoms they then enter into Narayana [who resides in the centre of Surya] > Aniruddha > (losing all physical attributes and transformed into mind alone) Pradyumna > Sankarshana (Jiva) (both those conversant with Sankhya and those that are devoted to the Supreme deity) > Kehetrajña (= Vasudeva) divested of sattva, rajas, and tamas; . . . thou wert beheld by us in Cvetadviva." D.-r. Narada became entirely devoted to Narayana, and dwelt in Badari for 1,000 celestial years (XII, 345). Vaicampayana related the discourse between Nara and Narayana on one side and Narada on the other about the rites in honour of the Pitrs. Narada, the son of Daksha, was originally the son of Brahmán, created before all others by a fiat of his will. On ore occasion the deities taught their children [the Pitrs] the crutis, and, having lost their knowledge, had to acquire it again from those sons (v. the note of PCR., p. 829); the gods and the Pitrs, placing three pindas on some blades of kuça-grass, worshipped each other. Then Narada asked why the Pitrs in days of yore acquired the name of pindas. Nara and Narayana said: The earth, in days of yore, disappeared, and was raised up by Govinda (Vrshākapi) in the shape of a gigantic boar; when the hour came for his morning prayers, he, suddenly shaking off three balls of mud from his tusk, placed them upon the earth and dedicated them to his own self, saying that he was resolved to create those that were to be called Pitre; seeing that the three balls of mud had fallen towards the south, he declared that these should be known henceforth by the name of Pitrs. Having then offered those pindas on the Varaha mountain, worshipping his own self, he disappeared. Therefore those who sacrifice to the Pitrs, etc., sacrifice, etc., to Vishnu himself (XII, 346). Vaicampāyana continued: D.-r. Nārada, after 1,000 years, repaired to his own retreat on Himarat, while Nara and Narayana remained in Badari, engaged in austerities; "the ancestors of that person who hates Narayana, sink into hell for ever"; glorification of Narayana, citing Vyasa and referring to Harigita (i.e. Bhagavadgita); " Vyasa is Nardyana on earth: who else could compile such a treatise as the Mahabharata? Having listened to the diverse kinds of duties and resolved upon a horse-sacrifice, let thy great sacrifice go-on."-Sauti continued: Formerly Narada had recited the discourse about Narayana to my preceptor in the hearing of many R. and the Pandavas and Krshna and Bhishma. Sauti's eulogium on Nūrūyana (δδ) (XII, 347). Caunaka said: "I have heard from thee the glory of the Supreme Soul, etc. (es); the form of Vishnu with the equine head, that appeared in the great ocean on the north-east was beheld by Brahmán Parameshthin." Caunaka then inquired why Hari had appeared, in the form of Aniruddha with the horse-head, to Brahmán. Sauti said he would recite that which Vaicampāyana recited to Janamejaya (in the Snakesacrifice), who put the same question to Vaicampayana. Janamejaya put the question to Vaiçampāyana. Vaiçampāyana expounded how the destruction is brought about of all things; then "from the primeval darkness (fraught with immortality) arises Brahman > Purusha = Aniruddha = Pradhana (divested of sex) = Avyakta = Viçvaksena Hari, who, yielding to yoga-sleep (nidrayogam), lays himself down on the waters thinking of the creation; > Ahankara = Brahman, etc. = Hiranyagarbha, who takes birth within the lotus [that springs] from Aniruddha. Adopting the attribute of sattva (sattvasthah), Brahmán commenced to create the universe. In the primeval lotus two drops of water had been deposited by Narayana: one like honey (madhu) which became Madhu made up of tamas; the other hard (kathina) which became Kaitabha made up of rajas; these two Asuras (Danavas), armed with maces, beheld within the lotus Brahman creating the four Vedas, seized them, and dived to Rasa[-tala] in the north-eastern ocean." Brahman complained before Icana (TT): then he hymned Hari (un): "my first birth from thee was due to a flat of thy will: my second birth in days of yore was from thy eyes; my third birth was from thy speech; my fourth birth was from thy ears; my fifth birth was from thy nose; my sixth birth was from an egg; this is my seventh birth, in this lotus." Purusha rose from his slumber and assumed an equine head, he who was the abode of the Vedas; the firmament became the crown of his head, etc.  $(\theta\theta)$ ; then he disappeared and proceeded to Rasa [-tala]; there he set himself to yoga, and adopting a voice according to the çikshā he began to loudly utter Vedic mantras. The two Asuras, making an appointment with the Vedas as to the time of their return, threw them down to Rasatala and ran after the sound. Meanwhile Hari took up all the Vodas and gave them to Brahman; he placed the horse-head in the northeastern ocean, [which horse-head], moreover, [was] the abode (alayam) of the Vedas, and thence he was called (babhava) Acvaçiras ("horse-headed"). Returning to the lotus, Madhu and Kaijabha saw him in the form of Aniruddha in yogasleep on the water, white, endued with stainless sattva, on the hood of a snake surrounded with a garland of flames. They awakened him and were slain by him; thence he came to be called Madhusudana. Aided then by Hari and assisted by the Vodas, Brahman created all the worlds. Then Hari disappeared. Once more, however, he assumed the same form for the sake of the religion of pravrtti (pravrttidharmartham B.; C. ottim dhao). The brahman who frequently (nityam) hears or mentally recites (dharayita) this story, will never forget his [Vedic or other] lore. Having adored with austere penances the god with the equino head, R. Pañcala [i.e. Galava, PCR.] acquired [the science of] Krama proceeding along the path pointed out by the deity [i.e. Rudra, PCR.; cf. XII, 343, 13261-63]. Hari is the receptacle (nidhih) of the Vedas, and of penances, and yoga, etc. (u); rta, etc. (kk), has Nārāyana for its soul; the Supreme Being is the cause of all this as Purusha and as Pradhana; he is the agent, etc.; the thoughts of all, including Brahmán, etc. (λλ), are known to Keçava; but none of these can know what his thoughts are, etc.; he is called Vasudova because of his being the abode of all creatures; he is the eternal highest M.-r., etc.; only the M.-r. that have knowledge for their souls behold the eternal Purusha who transcends all attributes (gunādhikam) (XII, 348). Janamejaya said that the ekantins [i.e. those who are devoted to Narayana with their whole souls at once attain to the fourth or highest end (i.e. Purushottama) without going through the three [i.e. Aniruddha, Pradyumna. and Sankarshana; PCR.], and this end is better than that attained to by brahmans studying the Vedas with the Upanishads, etc., and by Yatis; and he asked who first promulgated the religion of Devotion. - Vaicampayana said: When the Pandava and the Kuru armies were drawn up in array for the battle, and Arjuna became cheerless, Krshna himself explained this religion [sc. in the Bhagavadgītā]. Having created this religion in the Krta age, it is borne by Narayana himself. Narada was questioned about it by Arjuna in the midst of R. and in the presence of Krehna and Bhishma. My preceptor Vyasa heard what D.-r. Narada said, and imparted it to me. - I) In that Kalpa, when Brahmán took his birth in (A) the mind of Narayana (manasam janma) and issued from the latter's mouth. Nardyana himself performed the rites of this religion. From him it passed to R. Phonapah (froth-drinking) > Vaikhānasāh > Soma; then it disappeared,—II) A: the eves of Narayana (cakehusam janma): Some > Brahman > Rudra > R. Valakhilyah (in the Krta age); then it once more disappeared through the illusive power of that god [ Narayana, PCR.]. - III) A: the speech of Narayana (vacikam): Narayana > R. Suparna (who recited it thrice [a day, PCR.]trih parikrantavan-whence it came to be called Trisauparna. referred to in the Rgroda) > Vayu > R. Vighasaçinah [i e. who subsist on remains of sacrifices after feeding guests, etc.], > the ocean (mahodadhih); it once more disappeared and became merged (-samāhitah) into Nārāyaņa.—IV) A: the ear of Nārāyaņa (gravaņajā erehţiķ): Nārāyaņa > Brahmán (" . . . together with the Aranyakas") > Manu Svārocisha > his son Çankhapada > his son Suvarnābha (diçām pālam): when the Treta yuga came it once more disappeared .-V) A: the nose of Narayana (nasatye janmani): Narayana > Brahman > Sanatkumāra > Prajāpati Virana (in the beginning of the Krta age) > the muni Raibhya > his son Kukshi (diçām pālāya); then it disappeared.—VI) A: an egg [that sprang from Hari, PCR.] (andaje janmani): Narayana > Brahmán > Mu. Barhishads > Jyeshtha (a brahman who had mastered the whole Samaveda) > king Avikalpana (B. okampao); then it disappeared.—VII) A: the lotus that sprang from the navel of Narayana (this seventh birth, padmajam): Nūrāyana > Brahmán > Daksha > his eldest daughter's son Aditya (elder brother of Savity) > Vivasvat > Manu (in the beginning of the Ireta yuga) > his son Ikahvāku > the whole world; when the universal destruction comes (kshayants) it will once more return to Narayana.-The religion of the Yatis has been narrated to thee in the Harigitā. Nārada got it from Nārāyana himself. Nārāyana is adored (dreyate) as of one form (ekaryühavibhāgaḥ [i.e. as Aniruddha, PCR.]), or of two [do. + Pradyumna], or three [do. + Sankarshana] or four [do. + Vūsudeva]. - Janamejaya asked why all persons do not follow the religion of Devotion. Vaiçampāyana pointed to sattva, rajus, and tamas. Hari casts a kind eye upon the person endued with sattva; only Brahmán looks kindly upon him who is overwhelmed with rajas and tamas; D. and R. are given to sattra, but [the deities] not in its subtle form.—Asked by Janamejaya how one may attain to the Supreme Being (Purushottama), and about pravrtti, Vaiçampāyana said that the Sānkhya-Yoga, the Veda and Aranyakas (Vedaranyakam), and the Pañcaratra are parts of one whole (parasparaingani), and even this is the religion of the Ekantins, the Sattvika religion, the Ekantagati of the Yatis of Cvetadvipa (v. Cveta, pl.; differently PCR., v. the note, p. 852). Vyāsa imparted this religion to Yudhishthira (XII, 349) .- Janamejaya asked whether the Sānkhya, Pancarātra (B. Pāo), and Vedāranyaka are ekanishtha ("preaching the same course of duties," PCR.) or prthannishtha ("preaching courses of duties different from one another," PCR.), and about pravrtti. M.-r. Vaicampāyana said: "I bow to M.-r. [ Vydsa] (cf. § 77=I, 63), the sixth in the series beginning with Pitāmaha (Brahmán), sprung from a portion of Narayana, the only son [of his parents], whom Nārāyana in the first ages (ādikāleshu) created as his son, the unborn and ancient (ajam puranam), the great receptacle of the Vedas. Janamejaya said: When Vasishtha > Caktri > Paracara > Vyāsa, how can Vyāsa be the son of Nārāyana? Vaicampayana said: Vyasa dwelt for some time on the Himavat; he became tired of his penances owing to the great work of composing the Mahabharata (Bharatam akhyānam), waited upon by his disciples, Sumantu, etc.  $(\mu\mu)$ , recapitulating (arartayan) the Vedas, etc. (νν); asked by us, Vyāsa related: This narrative, belonging to the early times (adikalodbharam), has become known to me through my penances. In the seventh creation, that from the lotus (prajūvisarge vai saptame padmasambhave), Brahman being hesitating on account of the difficulty of creating, Narayana caused Intelligence (Buddhi) to enter Brahmán, who now created Dai., Da., G., and Ra., etc.; seeing that many of these would afflict D. and R., Narayana resolved upon incarnations (as boar, man-lion, dwarf, man), and upon upholding the carth as a snake in Patala. Then uttering the syllable bho, he, from the voice (Sarasvati) created Sarasvata Apantaratamas, whom he caused to distribute the Vedas in the Manvantara of Manu Svavambhuva, saving that he should do thus in each Manvantara, and, when Tishya (i.e. Kali-yuga) had set in, he should become the father of the Kauravas, etc., and distribute the Vedas into diverse classes, and be of a dark complexion, born from M.-r. Paraçara in Vasishiha's (the mind-born son of Brahmán) line by a maiden; he should know the past, the present, and the future; not he, but his son, should be freed from passion (rāgāt); he should see Krshna; Surya's son Canaiccara [i.e. the planet Saturn] will be a great Manu [read with B. Manur = Manu Savarni? during his Manvantara Vyasa will be one of the seven Rshis]; during that Manrantara thou shalt be the foremost of the class beginning with Manu (Manvadi-gana-purvakah [i.e. of the Manu, gods, Rshis, etc., in the respective Manvantara])." Vyūsa said: "I am he that was born as Apantaratamas; I underwent, in days of yore, the austerest penances."- Vaiçampāyana said: the preceptors (raktr, vettr) of the diverse systems (jnanani) are: 1) of Sankhya: the great R. Kapila; 2) of Yoga (read yogusya with B.): the primeval (puratanah) Hiranyagarbha; 3) of the Vedas: R. Apantaratamas, by some called Pracingarbha; 4) of Paçupata: Çira (the son of Brahman); 5) of Pañcarātra (B. Pāo): Bhagarat [i.e. Nārāyaṇa], and he may be seen in all the systems. The Sankhya, Yoga, and Vedus are eternal; those conversant with the Pañcarātra (R. Pāo) enter Nārāyaņa; all acts spring from R. Nārāyaņa (XII, 350).— Janamejaya asked whether there are many Purushas or only one, etc. Vaicampāyana said that in the Sānkhya and Yoga many Purushas are spoken of; but as the many Purushas have only one origin (yonih), so the one Purusha is the universe (viçvam) above the qualities (gunadhiham), citing the Vedas, etc. (FF), and the old narrative of the discourse between Brahman and Tryambaka (Civa), i.e. Brahma-Rudra-sam vāda (d) (XII, 351-2).

[Nivātakavacayuddhaparvan(°va).] ("Arjuna's combat with the Nivatakavacas," the 39th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.) § 441: One day, when the Parthas were thinking of Ariuna, they saw Indra's chariot (in which Indra had slain seven phalanxes of Diti's sons), driven by Mātali, illuminating the sky, and Arjuna descended and saluted each of them; Matali also greeted and instructed them, and then returned in the chariot to Indra. Arjuna then gave to Draupadi precious gems, etc., presented to him by Indra. Then he related all as it had happened, and slept that night with the two sons of Madri (III, 165). The next morning Indra visited them under the sound of musical instruments, etc., and blessed Yudhishthira, and advised him to repair to Kamyaka. Blessing upon the reader (III, 166).-§ 442: When Indra had gone, Arjuna related his journey from Kamyaka (see §§ 330-3), etc. (of mountains he mentioned only Bhrgutunga, where he spent one night and subsequently saw the brahman; then Himavat, where the meeting with the Kirāta took place on the first day of the fifth month after the beginning of his penances; the Kirāta multiplied a hundredfold and a thousandfold, and was transformed in various manners; Arjuna in vain employed the Vayavya, Sthundkarna (see Nil.), Jala (i.e. Varuna, Nil.), and the Calabhastra, and showers of shafts and stones, as the Kirata swallowed them up all; Arjuna in vain discharged the Brahmastra) (III, 167).—§ 443: Arjuna continuel his narrative (see §§ 334-7): he passed the night after the meeting with the Kirāta at that place, and in the morning he saw again the same brahman (= Indra), and in the evening he had the visit of the Lokapalue; the weapons that Indra promised to teach him were: those of Vayu, Agni, the Vasus, Varuna, the Marute, the Sadhya and Paitamaha weapons, those of the Gandharvas, Uragas (i.e. Snakes), and Rakehasas, and all the Vaishnava and Nairrta weapons [v. 12020 foll.]; in the chariot of Indra, Matali wondered that Arjuna Nivedana—Nivida.

was not jerked, though Indra always himself gets jerked at the first pull by the steeds [v. 12030]; when he had learnt the weapons, Indra said that now even the gods could not conquer him (v. 12054); he had received knowledge of fifteen weapons with five modes of using them, viz. prayoga [discharge], upasamhara [withdrawal], artti [redischarge], prayaccitta [revival of harmless beings slain by any weapon, PCR., Nil.], and pratighata [revival of weapons baffled by those of the enemies, PCR., Nil.] (vv. 12058-9); Indra asked him, as his fee, to slay the Nivatakavacas, who were thirty millions (tierah kotyah) in number and dwelt in the ocean, and gave him the chariot (conducted by Matali). upon which he (Indra) had vanquished Bali (Balim Vairocanim, v. 12068), Cambara, Bala, Vetra, Prahlada, and Naraka, and millions of Daityas, and "this" diadem. and ornaments like his own, and the impenetrable mail, and fastened "this" durable (ajarām) string to the Gandīva, and the gods gave him the shell Devadatta, through which Indra had conquered the worlds (cf. § 446)(III, 168).—§ 444: Arjuna continued: When he came to the ocean, he saw at a short distance the Daitya city filled with Danavas. Matali drove the chariot with force, and the Danavas shut the gates. Then Arjuna blew the Devadatta, and the Nivatakavacas appeared with iron javelins, maces, clubs, hatchets, sabres, discs, cataghnis, bhucundis, and swords, and sounded dissonant musical instruments. The Devarshis, the Danavarshis, the Brahmarshis, and the Siddhas came to the battle (III, 169). With arrows inspired with mantras relating to the Brahmanweapon (Brahmāstraparimantritaih), then with the Mādhava (PCR. Maghava) weapon and the Gandiva Arjuna killed innumerable Nivatakavaoas, and the 10,000 horses yoked at the chariot conducted by Matali trampled upon them (III, 170). Arjuna reduced a shower of crags to powder by the Mahendra weapon, then dried up showers of water by the weapon Vicoshana, that he had acquired from Indra; then he annihilated fire by the water weapon (salilastra), and by the stone weapon (cailona mahastrena) he repeatedly resisted the wind. Then darkness enveloped the world; the steeds turned away, Mātali fell off, and the golden lash fell from his hand; as Matali was stupefied, a terrible fear seized Arjuna; Matali said that he had conducted Indra's chariot in the battle for the sake of nectar, and in the battles with Cambara, Vrtra, Vairocani, etc., but never had he lost his senses before. Arjuna comforted Matali and repeatedly frustrated the magic of the enemy, and Matali again conducted the chariot. Then on a sudden Arjuna did not see the Panavas, who had become hidden by illusion (maya) (III, 171). Arjuna then fought with invisible weapons. Then they withdrew the illusion and entered their city. The fallen and their weapons covered the ground so that the horses had to proceed in the sky. The Nivatakavacas remaining invisible, covered the welkin with crags; others, entering into the earth, seized the legs of the horses and the wheels of the chariot. Arjuna became distressed, but being advised by Matali, he applied the thunderbolt, inspiring the Gandiva with mantras, so that the arrows sent by the thunderbolt, becoming thunderbolts, penetrated the illusions and killed the Nivatakavacas. While the wives of Danavas were bewailing and at last fled to their palaces, Arjuna and Matali entered the city, that was superior to that of the gods (to that of Indra, v. 12188). Matali told him that this was originally the city of Indra, but the gods had been driven away from it by the Nicatakaracas, who had through austerities gratified Pitamaha and obtained from him the boons, that they might reside here and be free from danger from the gods. When Indra applied to Srayambhū, he was told that he himself in another body should destroy them. As the gods were unable to slay them, Indra had given those weapons to Arjuna, so that he might destroy them, Then Arjuna and Matali again went to the abode of the gods (III, 172). - § 445: While returning he beheld a celestial city, moving at will, with trees of gems, etc., with four gates, etc., and Matali told him it was Hiranyapura, made by Brahman himself for the great Asuras, the Paulomas, and Kalakanjas, as the Dailey? Pulomā and the Mahasur? Kālakā had by practising austerities for 1,000 celestial years obtained from Scavambhū that their offspring should suffer little misfortune. be incapable of being killed by gods, and obtain an aërial, etc., city, invincible even by the gods, Maharshis, Yakshas, Gandharvas, Pannagas, Asuras, and Rakshasas. Brahman had destined that Arjuna, a mortal, should kill them. "Therefore destroy them with the thunderbolt." A battle ensued; the Asuras resorted to illusion; the city now entered into the earth, and now it rose upwards, etc. Shot with the iron shafts of Arjuna the city fell down. Then they environed him in 60,000 chariots, etc. Arjuna applied to Rudra, and seeing a man with three heads, nine eyes, etc., he applied the Raudra weapon to the Gandina; when it had been hurled, there appeared forms of deer, lions, tigers, Garudas, Gandharvas, Yakshas, Asuras, Guhyakas, Nairrtas, Yatudhanas, etc., by thousands. The Danavas, some of whom had three heads, some four tusks, etc., were destroyed. Arjuna again worshipped Tripuraghna (i.e. Civa). Matali rejoiced and praised Arjuna. The wives of the Danavas came out of the city bewailing the slain. Malali took Arjuna to the abode of Indra, and related in detail to Indra Arjuna's achievement, and Indra with the Maruts (v. 12269: the gods) praised him, and said that gods, Danaras, Rakshasas, Yakshas, Asuras, Gandharvas, birds, and serpents should not be able to resist him in fight, etc. (III, 173) .- § 446: Indra said that on the battlefield Bhishma, Drona, Krpa, Karna, Cokuni, etc., should not amount to 16 part of Arjunz. Then Indra gave him "this" golden garland, the shell Devadatta, etc. (see § 443). Then Indra told him to depart, "and thus after five years I come to you on the summit of this lower range of Gandhamadana (Gandhamadanapadasya)." Having promised that he should in the next morning show Yudhishthira all the celestial weapons. Arjuna passed that night there with all his brothers (III, 174).-§447: The next morning, when Arjuna was about to show the celestial weapons to Yudhishthira, the earth trembled, etc. The Brahmarshis, Siddhas, Maharshis, Devarshis, gods, Yakshas, Rakshasas, Gandharvas, etc., Pitamaka, the Lokapalas, and Mahadeva with his ganas appeared; Vayu threw celestial garlands, sent by the gods, on Arjuna, the Gandharvas chanted ballads, and Apsarases danced; and sent by the gods Narada came and prevailed upon Arjuna not to use the celestial weapons without necessity, as they would destroy the three worlds. Then the gods, etc., went whence they had come, and the Pāṇḍavas pleasantly dwelt in that same forest with Krshṇā (III, 175).

[Pancacikha-vakya(m)] ("the discourse of Pancaçikha"). § 6686 (Mokshadh.): Bhishma said: The Mithila king Janaka was always engaged in reflecting upon the courses of conduct that might lead to the attainment of Brahman. One hundred preceptors always used to live in his palace. Given to the study of the Vedas, he was not very well satisfied with the speculations of his instructors on the character of the soul and their doctrines of extinction upon the dissolution of the body or of rebitth after death. Once the great ascetic Pancacikha Kapileya came to Mithila, having roamed over the earth. He seemed to have assumed the form of that great R. [and] Prajapati, whom the Sankhyas call Kapila; they say he was the first disciple of Asuri [and] long-living. He was performing a mental sacrifice for 1,000 years (cf. Pancasrotas). He was fully conversant with the Pancaratra (i.e. "the sacrifice that leads to the state of Vishnu", Nil.) and the five sheaths that cover the soul, etc. He had approached one day a large concourse [ of R.] following the Sankhya doctrine (Kapilam), and instructed them about the Unmanifest; Asuri had inquired of his preceptor (? so Nil, and PCR.) and understood the distinction between the body and the soul, and had acquired celestial vision. For that assembly of R., Asuri made his exposition of Brahman. Puñcaçikha became a disciple of Asuri; he lived on human milk; he was accepted as a son by the brahmani Rapiki, the wife of Asuri, and used to suck her breasts. This was said to me by the holy one ii.e. Markandeva or Sanatkumara. Nil.]. Janaka, abandoning his 100 preceptors, began to follow Kāpileya (i.e. Pañcaçikha) upon the religion of emancipation which is explained in Sankhya treatises. "Some say that, when ignorance is destroyed by knowledge, the destruction of existence itself follows [this opinion also is erroneous]." The king became filled with wonder (XII, 218). Continuation of the discourse between Pañcaçikha and the king on the topic of existence and non-existence after death. The Mithilā king (Maithilena), beholding his city burning in a conflagration, himself proclaimed (gitam), "in this conflagration nothing of mine is burning." The king gave up his sorrows, etc. He who reads this discourse attains to emancipation (XII, 219).

[Pancendropākhyāna(m)] ("cpisode relating to the five Indras"). § 238 (cf. Vaivāhikap.): Vyāsa said to Drupada: In days of yore, when the gods were celebrating a great sacrifice in the forest of Naimisha, Yama, holding the office of camitr, did not slay the creatures, so that their numbers increased very greatly. Soma, Çakra, Varuņa, Kubera, the Sadhyas, the Rudras, the Vasus, the Acrins, etc., complained thereof to Prajapati, who comforted them, saying that when the sacrifice was over Yama would again sweep away the inhabitants of the earth. The gods then returned to the place of the sacrifice, and saw a golden lotus carried along the Bhagirathi. Indra proceeded to the spot where the Ganga issues, and saw a beautiful woman (it was Cri), whose tears were being transformed into golden lotuses. She led him to Mahadeva, who as a handsome youth was seated with a young lady on a throne on one of the peaks of the Himavat, playing dice. When Indra spoke haughtily of himself, Mahadeva caused Crt to paralyse him and lead him into a hole, where four Indras of old were confined in order to be reborn in the world of men, there to slay a large number of men, and then to regain the region of Indra. Their fathers should be Dharma, Vayu, Maghavat, and the Acrins, Indra creating a person from himself to be the fifth among them. Their names were Viçvabhuj, Bhūtadhāman, Cibi, Çānti, and Tojasvin. The weeping woman (Cri) was appointed to be their common wife in the world of men. Narayana, to whom Içana (i.e. Civa) and the five Indras repaired, approved of everything. The five Indras were reborn as the Pandavas, and Çrī as Draupadi. A white hair of Narayana's became Baladera, and a black Krshna, after having entered the wombs of Devaki and Rohini. Having related this to Drupada, Vydsa granted him celestial sight, so that he beheld the Pandavas endued with their former bodies .- § 239: Vyāsa then related to Drupada the story of the damsel (= Cri = Krshna) whom Cankara, i.e. Civa, appointed to be in a future birth the wife of five husbands (see § 220) (I, 197).

Pandavapravecaparvan ("the section relating to the entrance of the Pandavas"). § 549: Questioned by Janamejaya, Vaicampāyana related: Having obtained boons from Dharma, Yudhishthira returned to the hermitage and restored to the brahman his arant and mantha. Then he asked Arjuna to select some spot where they might dwell undiscovered. Arjuna mentioned some countries surrounding the kingdom of the Kurus (a). Yudhishthira chose the city of king Virata, who was attached to the Pandavas. Yudhishthira would introduce himself as a brahman named Kanka, who was skilled in dice and had been the friend of Yudhishthira (IV, 1). Bhimasena as a cook and wrestler named Vallava, who had served Yudhishthira; Arjuna (b-s) as a hermaphrodite, Brhannald by name, who had served Krehnā as a waiting-maid (IV, 2). Nakula as a keeper of horses, named Granthika, who had formerly been employed by Yudhishthira; Sahadeva as a cowherd, named Tantripala; Krahna would serve Sudeshna (the queen of Viraga) as a sairindhri, skilled in dressing hair, who had waited upon Krehna (IV, 3). Yudhishthira said: "Let our priest, with our charieteers and cooks, repair to the abode of Drupada and there maintain our agnihotra fires, and Indrasona, etc., with the empty chariots proceed to Dvaravati, and the maidservants go to the Pāncālas, together with the charioteers and the cooks. Let all of them say that the Pandavas had left them at the Dvaitarana lake." Dhaumya advised the Pandavas as to how they should behave at court and performed the rites ordained in respect of departure, and then set out for the Pañcalas, taking with him their sacred fires; Indrasena, etc., proceeded to the Yadavas (IV, 4). The Pandavas then proceeded in the direction of the southern bank of the river Kalindi and passed through the countries of the Yakrllomas and the Curasenas, leaving behind on the right the country of the Pancalas and on the left that of the Dacarnas. Arjuna carried Krehna. When they had reached the capital of Virata, Arjuna, as Gandiva was known to all men, caused them to stow away their weapons in a cami-tree near a cemetery. Nakula ascended the tree and tied the weapons fast. In the tree they hung up a corpse and said to the inquirers: "This is our mother, aged 180 years." They kept for themselves the names Jaya, Jayanta, Vijaya, Jayatsena, Jayadbala (IV, 5). Yudhishthira praised Durgā (f), who then showed herself to him and promised him victory, etc. (IV, 6). They then entered the city and were successively received by Virata. Yudhishthira (naming himself Kanka Vaiyaghrapadya) was accepted as a courtier (IV, 7). Bhimasena (naming himself Vallava) was accepted as a cook and a wrestler (IV, 8). Krshaā was seen by the queen Sudeshad Kaikeyi and accepted as a sairindhrī; she said: "My five husbands, who are Gandharvas and sons of a Gandharva king, always protect me" (IV, 9). Sahadeva came clad in a cowherd's dress and speaking the dialect of cowherds, and said that he was a vaicya named Arishtanemi. He was accepted as the king's head cowherd (IV, 10). Then Arjuna appeared dressed as an eunuch and naming himself Brhannala, and was accepted as a dancing master (IV, 11). Nakula, who named himself Granthika, likewise was accepted as the king's head horsekeeper (IV, 12).

On the new-moon day when the maharshis assembled in order to partake of a great gathering of gods, rshis, and pitrs in the abode of Brahman, P. wanted to accompany them with his wives from Catagraga to the north, but they told him that the princesses could not ascend the king of mountains (cailarāja), where they had seen the retreats of gods, Gandharvas, and Apsarases, and the gardens of Kubera, where only Vayu and the Siddhas and the paramarshis could go. As he complained of being childless, they told him to let somebody else raise offspring for him. P.'s conversation with Kunti. P. quoted the words of Manu Svavambhuva (b) and the example of Caradandayani (c) (I, 120): I, 120, 4643, 4645, 4647, (4654), 4665.—§ 186 (do.): Kunti in reply alleged the Pauranic narrative of Vuushitacua (a.v.) and entreated Pandu to beget children by his ascetic power (I, 121): I, 121, 4680.—§ 187 (do.): P. said that women formerly were not bound to adhere faithfully to their husband, and were not regarded sinful when yielding to their desire; that practice was applauded by the maharshis, and even now prevailed among birds and beasts and among the Uttara-Kurus. It was the muni Cvetaketu (b) who established the now existing practice (§ 188). P. further alleged the example of Madayanti (b) and of Vydea: I, 122 (4717).- § 189 (do.): Kunti related to Pandu how she had obtained the mantra from Durvasas (cf. § 131); P. told her to invoke Dharma (I, 122): I, 122, 4746, (4754).—§ 190 (Pändavotpatti): I, 123, 4767 (Yudhishthirah . . . [Pāṇḍurājyābhisheka] ("anointing of Pāṇḍu as a king"). § 173 (Sambhavap.): Upon the birth of those three children (§ 171), Kurujāngala, Kurukshetra, and the Kurus grew in prosperity, etc. The southern Kurus, in virtuous rivalry with the northern Kurus, walked about in the company of gods, rehis, and Cāranas. Virtuously ruled by Bhishma, the kingdom was adorned with hundreds of caityas and yapas. Dhrtarāshtra, Pāndu, and Vidura were brought up by Bhishma as if they were his own children, and became well exercised in archery, etc., and well read in the Itshāsas and Purānas and various sciences, and the Vedas and Vedāngas. Pāndu excelled all men in archery, Dhrtarāshtra in personal strength, Vidura in devotion to virtue. Ilastinapura was the foremost among cities. Because of Dhrtarāshtra's blindness and Vidura's being a pārasava (son of a brahman with a çūdra woman), Pāndu became king. One day Bhīshma addressed Vidura [about the marriage of the two princes] (I, 109).

Parikshit or Parikshit (C. has in book I orio, in books X-XVII orio; B. mostly orio), son of Abhimanyu and Uttarā, and futher of Janamejaya. § 11 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 606 (°ah . . . janma, °ri° also B.). - § 51 (cf. Astikap.): One day king P., the son of Abhimanyu, when hunting, having pierced a deer lost sight of it. He then asked the muni Camika, but received no answer as the muni was then observing the vow of silence; in anger the king then placed upon the muni's shoulder a dead snake and returned to his capital Hastinapura. Of this the muni's son Cringin was informed in a quarrel by his companion Krca (1, 40), and then cursed P., saying that within seven nights he should be stung to death by Takshaka. The muni was not pleased with the curse, as P. properly protected his subjects (I, 41). Therefore he sent his disciple Gauramukha to inform P., who became very repentant and sorrowful. A mansion was erected upon a solitary column and well guarded. The seventh day the brahman Kacyapa was coming desirous of curing the king. Takshaka in the shape of an old brahman met with Kāçyapa (I, 42). As Kāçyapa revived a banyan which had been reduced to ashes by being bitten by Takshaka, Takshaka gave to Kaçyapa more wealth than what he expected from P., and having ascertained by means of yoga that P.'s span of life was at an end, Kaçyapa retired. Takshaka went to Hastinapura, and hearing that P. was protected by poison-neutralizing mantras and medicines, he caused some serpents in the guise of ascetics to present the king with kuça-grass, water, and fruits, in one of which he himself was concealed as a tiny ugly insect. As such he appeared when P. was eating the fruit. P. said: "The sun is setting, to-day I have no more fear from poison; therefore let this insect becoming Takshaka bite me so that Parikshit—Pārshata, 540 the words of the ascetic may be rendered true." Then he placed the insect on his neck and was bitten by Takshaka. who coiled round his neck and uttered a tremendous roar (I, 43): I, 40, 1664 (Kauravavançajah), 1670, 1673 (rajā . . . Pativratānām lokā(h) ("the worlds of the faithful wives"): IX, 2896.

[Pativratāmāhātmyaparvan] ("the section about the greatness of the faithful wife") (cf. Pativratāyā māhātmyam Savitryah). § 545: Asked by Yudhishthira, Markandeya related, on account of Krehna: The Madra king Accounts. the husband of Malavi, was old and childless. After eighteen years of vows and offerings to Savitri, Savitri granted him a boon; he asked for many sons, but was promised a daughter. She was called Savitri. As nobody asked her in marriage, she was sent to look for a husband herself (III, 293). She chose Satyavat, the son of the Calva king Dyumatsona (the husband of Caibya), who had been blinded and deprived of his kingdom and lived as an ascetic in the forest. Satyavat equalled Rantideva Sankrti, Cibi Auginara, Yayati, etc., but Narada said: "Within a year of this day he will die"; then Narada went to heaven (III, 294). After her marriage Savitri dressed in bark garments, etc. (III, 295). She counted the days, and having ascertained that her husband would die on the fourth day following, she observed a triratra vow; on the fourth day all the ascetics uttered benedictions that she should never suffer widowhood; she would not eat before the sun set. She followed Satyavat as he, taking his axe, set out for the woods (III, 296). He fell ill and slept with his head on her lap. Yama himself—and not his emissary—came with a noose in his hand and pulled out of the body of Satyavat a person of the size of a thumb, bound it in the noose and proceeded in a southern direction. Savitri followed him and was granted five boons: (1) that her father-in-law should attain his eyesight and be strong; (2) that her father-in-law should regain his kingdom and never fall off from his duties; (3) that her father should have 100 sons; (4) that she and Satyavat should have 100 sons "begotten from both of us"; (5) that Satyavat should be restored to life and live 400 years. Yama untied the noose; she went back to the corpse and placed his head on her lap. Salyavat regained his consciousness. He was anxious about his parents, and they returned to the hermitage (III, 297). Meanwhile Dyumatsona had regained his sight, but was anxious at not finding Satyarat. He was comforted by the brahmans Suvarcas, Gautama, Bharadvāja, Dūlbhya, Apastamba, and Dhaumya. A little while afterwards Satyavat and Sāvitrī reached the hermitage. Sāvitrī narrated everything that had happened and was praised by the rshis (III, 298). Meanwhile the enemy of Dyumatsona had been slain by his minister, and Dyumatsona then again became king of the Cālvas. Sāvitrī after a long time gave birth to 100 sons, and her father also got 100 sons by Mālavī. "So also Krshņā will rescue ye all." Yudhishthira and his brothers continued to live in the Kāmyaka forest (III, 299).

Pativratāyā māhātmya(m) Sāvitryāh ("the greatness of the faithful wife Sāvitrī"). § 10 (Purvasangr.): I, 2, 326 (i.e. Putivratāmāhātmyaparvan).

[Pativratopākhyāna] ("the story of the faithful wife") and [Brahmanavyadhasamvada] ("a conversation between a brahman and a hunter") (cf. Pativratāyā ākhyānam). § 479 (Mārkand.): Questioned by Yudhishthira about the virtue of women, Markandeya, saying that the work of a mother is more difficult than that of a father, and that for women neither sacrifices nor graddhas nor fasts are of any efficacy, but that they can win heaven only by serving their husbands (III, 205), related: When the brahman Kauçıka, who had studied the Vedas and the Upanishads. was reciting the Vedas under a tree, a female crane befouled his body, and looked upon with anger by Kauçıka fell to the ground. Kaucika regretted his angry deed. When he had entered a village in order to procure alms, in a certain house the wife first served her husband, who came home tired and hungry, with food, etc. (description), and then began to conciliate the angry Kaucika, who blamed her for exalting her husband above the brahmans. She said that she was no she-crune, that she knew that the ocean had been made brackish and undrinkable by the wrath of the brahmans, that the fire of their wrath had not to this day been extinguished in the forest of Dandaka, but that she regarded her husband as her supreme god, and deserved forgiveness, that anger is a foe to men within themselves, and that the gods know him to be a brahman who has abandoned anger and passion, etc., and who, though himself injured, never returns the injury, etc., that virtue (dharma) is difficult to understand, but must be based on truth; the ancients have declared that virtue depends on gruti, but it is variously defined (bahudhā drcyate) and subtle to be understood (sūkshma); "thou art cognisant of virtue and studiest the Vedas; but I think, however, that thou dost not know what virtue really is; a fowler (vyādha) in Mithila will discourse to thee on virtue." Kaucika blessed her, and returned to his abode, reproaching himself (III, 206).- § 480: He set out for Mithila (description), ruled over by Janaka, and found out the fowler, who was seated in a butcher's yard, selling venison and buffalo meat to a large crowd of buyers; but he at once went to Kaucika, and proving that he knew why he had come, he led him to his abode, where he honoured him duly, and explained to him that, notwithstanding his cruel trade, which he had inherited from his sires and grandsires, and which belonged to his caste by birth, he led a virtuous life, serving his superiors and old people, speaking truth. never Patrorna--Paţţiçin. 546 envying others, giving to the best of his power, etc. In the kingdom of Janaka there did not exist a single subject that did not follow the duties of his caste. He did not slav the boars and buffaloes himself, nor did he cat meat himself; he fasted during the day and ate in the night; "even though the behaviour of his order be bad, a person may yet be himself of good behaviour; so also a person may become virtuous, although he may by profession be a slayer of animals." It is the fault of the kings when the subjects decay, and monsters, dwarfs, etc., are produced, but Janaka ruled justly. If one repents a wrong done by him, he is delivered from his sin (v. 13751). If a man seeks redemption (kalyāņam abhipadyate) after having committed a sin, he becomes purified of all his sins (v. 13756). It is temptation (lubha) that constitutes the basis of sin. Then he gave some advice as to what is virtuous conduct (v. 13794 foll,: "these three are said to constitute the perfect way (padam) of the virtuous: a man must not do wrong to anybody, he must give alms, and must always be truthful"); (v. 13797 foll.: "freedom from malice, forbearance, peace of mind, contentment, pleasant speech, renunciation of desires and anger, virtuous conduct, and actions regulated according to the ordinances of the sacred texts, constitute the perfect way (margam) of the virtuous") (III, 207). The fowler and the animals slain by him are driven by their karman in a former life. In days of yore 2,000 animals and 2,000 cows used to be killed every day in the kitchen of king Rantideva; at the citurmasya animals are sacrificed: the cruti says, "The fires are fond of meat" (v. 13812), and at the sacrifices animals are killed by the regenerate, and these animals are purged of sin, and by mantras go to heaven. Regarding unimal food this rule has been laid down by munis: Whoever partakes of animal food after having first offered it duly and respectfully (yathāvidhi yathāçrāddham) to the gods and the Pitrs, is not polluted by the act. The cruti says, "Such a man is not one who partakes of animal food," and a brahman who has intercourse with his wife during her season is a brahmacarin. King Saudasa, under the influence of a curse, ate human flesh. Agriculture is considered to be praiseworthy, though the plough destroys many creatures. Seeds of rice, etc., are all living creatures. As to hunting and the cutting of trees and herbs, many creatures live in trees and fruits and water. The earth and the air are all swarming with living organisms, which are unconsciously destroyed by men from mere ignorance (III, 208). When life is at stake and in the matter of marriage, it is justified to tell an untruth. Whichever conduces most to the good of all creatures is considered to be truth (satyam) (v. 13845; cf. v. 13990). The fowler discoursed upon the influence of karman upon metempsychosis and salvation (moksha; Brahmanah padam, v. 13895) (III, 209).- 481: Questioned by Kaucika about the senses, the fowler discoursed about the sinful (in thought, word, and action (v. 13906); the evolution of sin is this: First manas is bent on viñana; thence successively originate kāma, rosha, karman, rūga, dvesha, lobha, moha, vyūja, adharma, pāpa). The virtuous man discorns these evils by means of his spiritual insight (v. 13908).- § 482: Then he shortly enumerated the elements of the brahmi vidya (the universe, consisting of the five great elements, space, wind, fire, water, and earth, is Brahman [neuter]; their qualities: sound, touch, form, flavour, and taste; manas, buddhi, ahankara; the five senses, atman, rajas, sattra, tamas; the last seventeen are "rāçir avyaktasañjñakah", in all (with the objects of senses and the manifest and the unmanifest) twenty-four (caturvincaka itu ciha ryaktaryaktamayo gunah) [read ganah, cf. Hopkins, Great Epic, p. 34] (III, 210).-§ 483: A somewhat more detailed explanation of the five elements and their qualities. The terms vyakta and avyakta (v. 13931). Salvation, etc., are dependent on self-discipline (tapas), that is impossible without subduing the senses. The body is like a chariot, the coachman being the soul, and the horses the six senses (III, 211).- § 484: The three qualities sattra, rajas, and tamas (III, 212).- § 485: The five vital airs (prāņa, samāna, apāna, udana, vyāna), that are all scated (pratishthitah, v. 13973) in the navel, and by whose collision the internal fire is generated that digests the food. The arteries (nādyah), issuing from the heart in all directions, carry the essence of food (annarasan) acted upon by the ten pranas. The perception of the internal spirit, purification of the heart, destroys the good and evil effects of actions and leads to eternal beatitude. That state of peace and purification of heart (prasadasya, v. 13984) is likened to the state of a person who in a cheerful state of mind (trptah) sleeps soundly (sukham), or to a lamp shining on a windless spot, well kindled. Community with Brahman cannot be taught to us even by the guru (v. 13992) (III, 213). -§ 486: Saying "Thou shalt see by what means I have attained to this blissful state", the fowler introduced Kauçika to his parents, whom he honoured together with his wife and children like gods (description; v. 14025: "I do what is agreeable to them, even though it be not strictly justifiable") (III, 214).—The fowler said: "Thou hast wronged thy father and thy mother, for thou hast left home without their permission, for the purpose of learning the Vedas, and they have become blind from grief at thy loss. Thereby thy ascetic merit, etc., have become useless to thee. Do return home this very day." Kaucika acknowledged that the fowler had rescued him when he was on the point of falling into hell, and that he did not consider him to be a çudra, as it was very difficult for a çudra to learn the eternal religion (dharmah); his being a çudra must surely be due to any action in a former birth; this Kauçika wished to learn .- § 487: The fowler told: "I was formerly a brahman, son of an eminent brahman, and versed in the Vedas and the Vedangas, and friend of a king, who was accomplished in the Dhanurveda, and thence skilled in archery myself; one day, when I accompanied the king on a hunting expedition, I killed a rehi, whom I took for a deer, and was cursed by him to be born as a fowler in the cudra caste (III, 215); but I prevailed upon him to grant me that I should remain a pious man and honour my parents, and thereby attain great perfection (siddhim), remember my past life, and again become a brahman. I took the rehi to the hermitage, and he did not die."-Kaucika saluted him respectfully, and having returned home he honoured his old parents (III, 216).

[Pavana-çalmali-samvada(h)]("the discourse between the Wind-god and the calmali-tree"). § 654b (Apaddh.): Bhīshma said: There was a lordly calmali-tree on the Himavat. One day Narada praised it, saying that Pavana must be its friend and protector, since he spared it, though he eradicates the tallest and strongest trees (XII, 164). The calmali said that the Wind was not its friend, but that it was stronger itself than the Wind. Narada warned him, saying that the Wind was stronger than even Indra, etc. (a) (XII, 155). Informed by Narada, the Wind came and rebuked the calmali-tree, saying that he had spared it because Brahmán, while creating the world, had for a time rested under it. The calmali laughed and challenged the Wind to show his power, which the Wind threatened to do next day. When night came the calmali reflected that all that it had said to Narada was false, that it was in reality weaker than other trees, and inferior in might to the Wind: "but in intelligence no tree is my equal" (XII, 156). The calmali then caused all its branches to be cut off. The Wind smiled; the calmali felt great shame, and, remembering the words of Narada, repented greatly of his folly.

Wind and Ariuna Kartavirva"). § 772b (Anucasanik.): Bhishma said: The Haihaya king Arjuna Karlavirya, with 1,000 arms, became the lord of the whole of this world (i.e. the earth) [rosiding] in Mahishmati; he gave large gifts to Dattatreya, who granted him four boons: that he should have 1,000 arms in battle, but only two at home; that he should subjugate the whole earth righteously, and sway her with vigilance; and that whenever he might happen to go wrong, the righteous should set him right. A. now regarded himself as having no equal. A celestial voice said that the brahman is superior to the kshatriya; A. maintained that the brahmans take refuge with the kehatriyas; what the virgin Gayatra had said from the sky was not true (asatyam, so B. and Nil.). "I shall bring the skin-clad brahmans under my subjection." At these words of A. the invisible goddess (Gayatri) became agitated (vitrasta 'bhan neçācarī; cf. Nīl.). Then Vāyu (wind) warned A., addressing him from the air. Asked by A. what kind of earthly creature the brahman is, if he resembles the wind, water, fire, sun, or sky (XIII, 153), Vayu praised the brahmans above all, citing Kaçyapa (c), Angiras (d), Gaulama (s), [Kapila] (f), Aurva (g), and Dattatreya; even Agni (h) and Brahmán (i) are brahmans; the large kingdom of the Dandakas was destroyed by a brahman; the ocean, that was full of crystal water, cursed by the brahmans, became saline in taste. Arjuna remained silent (XIII, 154). Vayu repeated the story of Kaçyapa in detail, and asked Arjuna if he knew a kshatriya superior to Kacyapa. Arjuna remained silent. Then Vayu related the story of Utathya (j) (XIII, 155). Arjuna remained silent. Vayu then described the greatness of Agastya (k). Arjuna remained silent. Vayu related a feat of Vasishtha's (1) (XIII, 156). Arjuna remained silent. Vayu related a feat of Atri's (m). Arjuna remained silent. Vayu related a feat of Cyavana's (n) (XIII, 157). Arjuna remained silent. Vayu related the history of the Kapas (p). Arjuna praised the brahmans, mentioning Dattatreya. Fayu told him always to protect them; "a terrible danger threatens thee from the Bhrgus; that will take place after a time" (XIII, 158).

by the Vidarbha king, and its waters were mixed with soma juice (see Nil.); III, 120, †10289 (visited by Yudhishthira, etc., on his tirthayatra), †10290.—§ 403b (do.): Here (i.e. on the river P.) king Nrga gratified Indra by offering soma. Here the gods with Indra and the Prajapatis performed sacrifices. Here king Gaya Amurtarayasa satisfied Indra with soma in seven horse-sacrifices, where all the articles, which else are made of wood or earth, were of gold. Seven sets of these articles were prepared by him, and at the top of each sacrificial stake seven rings were fastened; the gods themselves with Indra erected the sacrificial stakes. Indra became delighted with soma and the brahmans with the dakshinas, which were innumerable as the sand-grains, the stars, or the raindrops. Gaya presented the brahmans with golden cows (otherwise PCR.) made by Viçvakarman, so numerous were his caityas that but little space was left on the earth. Prabhasatirtha = Prabhasa : I, 399, 444; III, †10237. Prabhasotpattikathana(m) ("on the origin of Prabhāsa"). § 615 (Baladeyat.): Daksha had twenty-seven daughters, married to Soma, connected with the several constellations serving to help men in calculating time, all beautiful; Rohins, however, was the foremost in beauty. As Soma lived long with Robins, his other wives complained to Duksha, who got them reconciled. As Soma, however, still continued to live with Robini exclusively, his other wives once more approached Daksha, who now threatened to curse him. His threats were not, however, heeded, and when the wives complained a third time, Daksha cursed Soma, so that he was affected with phthisis. His sacrifices, etc., were in vain; the herbs became tasteless and failed to grow, etc. The gods prevailed upon Daksha to withdraw the curse on condition that Soma should behave equally towards all his wives, and bathe in the tirtha (sc. Prabhaea) where the Sarasyati mingles with the ocean, and adore Mahadeva there; then he should during the one half of the month wane every day and during the other wax every day. Bathing there on the day of new moon, he was restored. Daksha told Soma not to disregard women and brahmans.

Some there regained his effulgence (prabhā).

Prabhātā (wife of Prajāpati and mother of the Vasus Pratyūsha and Prabhāsa). § 116 (Vasu, pl.): I, 66, 2584.

Prabhasa became the foremost of all tirthas; Soma bathes there on every recurring day of the new moon and regains his form and beauty; thence comes its name Prabhasa, because [Prajāgaraparvan(°va)] ("section relating to the sleeplessness of Dhṛtarāshṭra," the 59th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; cf. Prajāgara). § 557: Dhṛtarāshṭra, after Sañjaya had left him, requested Vidura to tell him what may be good for a person that is sleepless and burning. Vidura said that Yudhishṭhira was worthy of being the sovereign over the three worlds, while the qualities of Dhṛtarāshṭra were the very reverse of those; Dhṛtarāshṭra had no right to a share in the kingdom owing to his being blind: Vidura blamed him for having bestowed on Duryodhana, Cakuni, Karna, and Duncasana the management of the empire. Then he explained the marks of a wise man and of a fool, quoting Brhaspati's answer to Indra, and alluding to the conversation between Sudhanvan and Asurendra [i.e. Prahlada] in relation to the son of the latter (V, 33). Continuation of Vidura's discourse (V, 34).- § 558: Vidura said that as long as a man's good deeds are spoken of in this world, so long he is glorified in heaven, and cited the old story about the conversation between Virocana (q.v.) and Sudhanvan, both suitors for Kecini's hand. "Entrusting the cares of thy kingdom to Duryodhana, Cakuni, the foolish Duhçasana, and to Karna, how canst thou hope for prosperity? Possessed of every virtue, the Pandavas depend on thee as their father; oh, confide thou in them as thy sons" (V, 35). -§ 559: Vidura related the old history of the discourse between Atreya and the Sadhyas, who received instruction from Atreya when he was wandering as a beggar ("... One should not return the slanders or reproaches of others, for the pain that is felt by him who suffers silently, consumes the slanderer; and he that endures, succeeds also in appropriating the virtues of the slanderer-the slanderer's merits become his . . . The very gods desire company of that man who, when abused, does not himself return the abuse nor cause others to return it, or who, when beaten, does not himself return the blow nor cause others to do it. and who wishes not the slightest injury to him that injures him . . . "). Then he explained what are those families that are called high (". . . let none in our race serve a king as minister") (V, 36). Vidura spoke of the seven and ten kinds of foolish men according to Manu Svayambhuva; of the reasons why not all men attain the allotted period of life (100 years according to the Veda), etc. But Dhrtarashtra could not abandon his son (V, 37-40).

§ 603 (Nārāyanāstramokshap.): VII, 202 a., 9630.—§ 6608 (Bhrgu-Bharadvajasamv.): XII, 184, 6844 (oat praniyate prant), 189, 6965. -§ 660c (do.): The wind or breath called Prana residing within the head, and the heat that is there, cause all kinds of exertion. That Prans is the living creature, the universal soul, the eternal Being, and the Mind, Intellect, and Consciousness of all living creatures, etc. Thus the living being is, in every respect, caused by Prana to move about and exert . . . That heat, residing between Apana and Prana, in the region of the navel, operates, with the aid of those two breaths, in digesting all food that is taken by a living creature. There is a duct beginning from the mouth down to the anal canal. Its extremity is called the anus. From this main duct (srotas) numerous subsidiary ones branch out in the bodies of all living creatures. In consequence of the rush of the several breaths (Prana, Samana, etc.) those breaths mingle together. The heat (agnily) [that dwells in Prana, PCR.] is called Ushman. It is this heat that causes digestion . . . The breath called Prana, the bearer of a current of heat, descends [from the head, PCR.] downwards to the extremity of the anal canal and thence is pushed upwards again. Coming back to its seat in the head it once more sends back the heat it bears. Below the navel is the region of digested matter, and above it that for the food not yet digested. The navel is the depositary of all the forces of life, which sustain the body. Urged by the ten kinds of breaths the ducts (nadyah). branching out from the heart, convey the liquid juices that food yields upwards, downwards, and in transverse directions. The main duct leading from the mouth to the anus is the path by which yogins succeed in attaining to Brahman by holding the soul within the brain. Even thus heat is planted in the breaths called Prana and Apana of all embodied creatures. That heat is always burning there like fire in any vessel: XII, 185, 6868, 6870, 6878, 6882.-$ 662b (Japakop.): XII, 200c, 7346.- 667 (Mokshadh.): XII, 213. 7758. - § 668 (Pancacikha-v.): XII, 219. 7939 (prānāpānau).- § 677 (Mokshadh.): XII, 240, 8740 (do.); 253, 9091 (do.). - § 6956 (Dakshayajñavināça): XII, 285, 10337 (do.).- § 704 (Mokshadh.): XII, 302, 11124.-§ 714g (Samāna): XII, 329, 12397 (son of Apāna), 12398, 12399.—§ 782b (Brāhmaņagītā): XIV, 20a, 612, 613, 614; 21, 646, 647, 653; 23, 685, 687, (691), 692, 693, 694, 696, 697, 699, 705 (the contention of the vital breaths about superiority); 24, 712, 716, 719, 722; 25, 742; 28, 789. - § 782g (Guruçishyasamv.): XIV, 42, 1109.

Pratijnāparvan("va) ("the section including the wow of Arjuna," the 74th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.).—§ 10 (Parvas.): I, 2, 339.—§ 596: In the evening, when Arjuna, having slain large numbers of Samçaptakas, proceeded towards his tent, he said to Krehna that his heart was affrighted; he noticed indications of disaster; Abhimanyu did not come out with smiles to receive him, etc. He remembered that Drona had this day formed the circular army, which none save Abhimanyu could break, but he had not taught him how to come out of it, after having pierced it: he had heard the leonine shouts of the Dhartarashtras. and Krehns had heard Yuyutsu censuring them for having slain a child instead of Arjung, and then Yuyutsu had thrown away his weapons afflicted with rage and grief. Krehna consoled Arjuna, referring to the kehatriya duties and heaven. None save Krehna and Yudhishthira (who were always acceptable to him) could address Arjuna. Yudhishthira. addressing him, told (VII, 72) him the particulars of Abhimanyu's heroism and fall. Arjuna vowed to slay Jayadratha before the setting of the morrow's sun (his oath): even as to As., D., men, birds, snakes, P., wanderers of the night, B.-r., D.-r., etc., he said that they would not succeed in protecting him, even if he entered Rasatala, or ascended the firmament, or repaired to the city of the gods (Devapuram) or the city of Diti (Diteh puram); if the sun set before he had slain him, he would himself ascend the pyre. Arjuna bent the Gandiva, Krshna blew the Puncajanya, Arjuna the Devadatta (VII, 73). Having been informed by spies, Jayadratha was overwhelmed with sorrow and fear, thinking that not even Drona, etc. (a), not even D., G., Ac., U., Rā., can protect him against Arjana; he wished to return home. Duryodhana comforted him, saying that he, . Karna, etc. (3), would protect him. Jayadratha, accompanied by Duryodhana, repaired that very night to Drona and questioned him about the difference between himself and Arjuna. Drong said they had got the same instruction, but Arjuna was superior to Jayadratha in consequence of yoga and the hard life led by Arjuna; Drona would, however, protect him, forming an impenetrable array; and, moreover, death ought not to be an object of terror to him (VII, 74). Krshna remonstrated with Arjuna for his rash vow; the Kurus had expected an attack by Arjuna; now. they will protect Jayadratha (who had mentioned Arjuna's encounter with Civa, Hiranyapura, etc.); Karna, etc. (γ) would be in Jayadratha's van; Drona's army would be half a cakata and half a lotus with a needle-mouthed array in the middle (VII, 75). Arjuna assured Krshna of his competence to accomplish his vow, notwithstanding Drona, Sa., R., V., A., M., with Indra, V.-D., D., P., G., Garuda, etc., by the means of Gandiva and the weapons he had obtained from Yama, etc. (8), and the Brahma weapon (VII, 76). The gods with Indra became very anxious. Sinister omens appeared in nature. Krshna went to Arjuna's abode and comforted Subhadra (with the kshatreya duties, etc., and revenge) (VII, 77). Subhadrā lamented over Abhimanyu, and said "fie on Bhimasena, etc." (c), because they had not protected him. Draupadi and Uttard came to her, lamenting. Krahna said that Abhimanyu had obtained the most lauduble and enviable goal. Then he returned to Arjuna (VII, 78). Arjuna performed his usual nightly sacrifice to Civa. Krehna with Daruka repaired to his own tent. None in the Pandara camp slept that night, thinking of Arjuna. In the middle of the night Krehna said to Daruka that he had resolved to fight to-morrow [if necessary]; he should equip his chariot, placing on it Kaumodaki, etc., making room for Garuda, and yoking thereto Balāhaka, etc. (ζ); when hearing Pāñcajanya emitting the shrill Rehabha note, he should come to Krehaa (VII, 79). Arjuna in a dream saw Krehna, who told him not to grieve, and mentioned the Pacupata weapon (with which Civa slew all the Daityas in battle); if he remembered it now, he would be able to slay Jayadratha to-morrow; otherwise he should pray to Civa. At the Brahma hour, Ariung saw himself sojourning through the sky (Himavat); Manimat, frequented by Si. and Ca., etc. (7) with Krehna, to where Civa was scated with Parvati (description) (8); Krehna and Arjuna hymned Mahadeva (VII, 80). Arjuna saw that the offerings he had made every night to Krahna had come to Civa, and he mentally worshipped both Krshna and Civa. Civa then told Krehna and Arjuna where to fetch his bow and arrow from a lake of amrta. In the lake they saw two terrible snakes; when they had uttered the Brahma Catarudriya, the snakes assumed the forms of a bow and arrow. From Civa's body there came out a brahmacarin of blue throat and red locks, and having showed Arjuna the use of the bow and arrow, and the mantras, he sped these weapons to that same lake. Having thus once more obtained the Pāçupata woupon, Arjuna with Krehņa came back to their own camp (VII, 81) .- § 597: THE FOUR-TEENTH DAY. Yudhishthira underwent his morning rites (very copious description); Krehna visited Yudhishthira (VII. 82). Then also Virata, etc., came (a). Yudhishthira asked Krshna to rescue the Pandavas, quoting Narada. Krshna assured Yudhishthira of Arjuna's success (VII, 83). Arjuna came and acquainted Yudhishthira of his dream. Then he and Krshna and Yuyudhana (these two in one chariot) set out to Arjuna's pavilion. Krshna equipped Arjuna's chariot (which had previously been sanctified by mantras), which Arjuna' circumambulated, bow and arrows in hand. Arjuna, Yuyudhana, and Krehna mounted the chariot. Many auspicious omens appeared. Arjuna charged Yuyudhana to protect Yudhishthira in his absence (only he or Pradyumna is able to do it). Yuyudhana proceeded to Yudhishthira (VII, 84).

Prthu Vainya (C. sometimes Vainya), a mythical king. § 11 (Parvasangr.): I, 2, 466 (or Vainyasya yatroktam ākhyānam paramarshinā (i.e. Mūrkundeya); in the third book of Mhbhr., however, the narrative alluded to is not found).— § 296 (Dyūtap.): II, 53, 1929 (Vainyah).- § 574 (Jambūkh.): VI, 9aa, 314 (Vainyasya).- § 595 (Shoduçarāj.): King Prthu Vainya in his rajasuya was installed by M.-r. as emperor (samrajye); (etymology of Prthu, kshatriya, and rajan). During his time the earth yielded crops in sufficiency, etc.; the kuça blades were all of gold, etc.; when king P. went to the sea, the waves became solid; the very mountains used to open before him that he might pass through them. Once the trees, the mountains, the gods, the Asuras, the men, the Uragas, the seven rshis, the Yakshas, the Apsarases, and the Pitrs came to P. and calling him their emperor (samrāt), etc., asked boons from him. Taking his Ajagava bow, P. caused them to milk the Earth (whom he made his daughter) by means of a calf (A), a milker (B), and vessels (C) for various kinds of milk (D): (1) [the trees]: the cala-tree (A), the fig-tree (plakshah) (B.), a vessel of udumbara wood (C), torn buds (chinnaprarohanam) (D). (2) [The mountains]: the eastern hill (Udayah parvatah) (A), Meru (B), a stone (açmamayam) vessel (C), gems and herbs (D). (3) [The gods]: a god (Indra?) (B), things capable of bestowing strength (D). (4) The Asuras: Virocana (A), Drimurdhan (B), an unbaked pot (C), wine (madyam) (D). (5) Men: Manu Svayambhuva (A), Prthu (B), cultivation and crops (D). (6) The serpents: Takshaka (A), Dhrtardshtra (B), a gourd (C), poison (D). (7) The seven rshis: Soma (A), Brhaspati (B), chandas (U), the Vodus (D). (8) The Yakshas: Vrehadhvaja (A), Vaicravana (i.e. Kubera) (B), an unbaked pot (C), the power of disappearing at will (antardhanam) (D). (9) The Gandharvas and the Apsarases: Citraratha (A), Viçvaruci (B), a lotus (C), perfumes (D). (10) The Pitrs: Yama Vaivasvata (A), Antaka (B), silvera vessels (C), svadha (D). "To this day the creatures exist in the same way." P. caused golden images to be made of every article on earth and bestowed them all on the brahmans at his great horse-sacrifice, also 66,000 elephants of gold; also the whole world (VII, 69): VII, 69, 2394 (Vainyam), 2395, 2396 (Vainyam), 2406 (Vainyah), 2408, 2414, 2421 (Vainyah).- § 632b (Shodaçarāj., cf. § 595): XII, 29, 1030 ( Vainyam), 1031, 1032 ( Vainyam, repetition from § 595).-§ 641f (cf. Vena). When P. had sprung from the right hand of Vena, the M.-r., R., and the gods told him to observe righteousness and punish the wicked, etc. Cukra became his priest, the Valakhilyas his counsellors, the Sarasvatas his companions (Sarasvatyo ganas tatha), the M.-r. Garga became his astrologer (samvatsarah); Suta and Magadha (who came into existence before P.) became his panegyrists, he gave to Sats the land lying on the sea-coast (Anapadeçam), to Magadha Magadha. P. made the earth even (in every manvantara the earth becomes uneven), removing the rocks lying around with the horn of his bow; by this means the hills and the mountains became enlarged. Then Vishau, etc. (8) crowned P. and gave him rich gifts; steeds, chariots, etc., came into existence as soon as P. thought of them.

At this time there was neither decrepitude nor famine, etc., nobody had any fear from reptiles and thieves, etc.; when he proceeded to the sea, the waters used to be solidified, the mountains granted him passage, etc. He drew from the earth as a milker from a cow seventeen kinds of crops for the Y., Ra., and N., etc. He caused all creatures to regard righteousness as the foremost of all things; he was called rajan (etymology) and kehatriya (etymology), etymology of the name Prthivi. Vishnu confirmed his power and entered his body in consequence of his penances; for this reason the entire universe bows to the king as to a god. At this time a gold lotus was born from Vishnu's brow, from that lotus was born the goddess Cri, who became the spouse of Dharma ("righteousness"); their son was Artha ("profit"); all the three were established in sovereignty. The king is really a portion of Vishnu on earth. He who once beheld his (P.'s?) amiable face became (becomes?) obedient to him: XII, 59, 2234 (Vainyah). $ 656f (Khadgotpattik.): It was Prthu Vainya who first created the bow; he also milked the earth for very many [sorts of] grain (çasyani) and protected the earth virtuously as before: XII, 166, 6205 .--§ 673b (Bali-Vāsavasamv.): XII, 227, 8261 (among the uncient rulers of the earth).- § 761 (Anuçasanik.): XIII, 1158, 5667 (did not eat meat during the month of Karttika). - § 770 (do.): XIII, 151μ, 7125 (Vainyam nrpavaram Prthvi yasyabhavat suta | Prajapatim sarvabhaumam).-§ 795 (do.): XIII, 1664, 7680 (adirajah Pour Vainyah). § 157: Vicitravirya died without leaving a child. Then Satyavati began to think how the dynasty of Duchyanta might be perpetuated, and she recollected the rshi Draipāyana and prevailed upon him to beget three children for Vicitravirya: Dhrtarashtra, Pandu, Vidura.—In consequence of a boon granted by Dvaipāyana, Dhrtarāshtra had 100 sons by Gandhari, of whom the most celebrated were Duryodhana, Duhçasana, Vikarna, and Citrasena. - Pandu had two wives: Kunti or Prtha, and Madri. One day, when hunting, he with his arrow pierced a rshi cohabiting with [his wife in the shape of] a deer. The rshi cursed him, saying that he should also die when in such a state. Pandu then prevailed upon Kunti to raise offspring for him, and by Dharma she had Yudhishthira, by Maruta (i.e. the Wind) Bhimasena, and by Çakra (i.e. Indra) Arjuna. He then caused her to impart on Madri the vidya (i.e. the mantra of invocation), and Madri by the Acrins had Nakula and Sahadeva. One day when Pandu, filled with desire, touched Madri, he immediately died, and Madri ascended the funeral pyre with him, after having recommended her twins to Kunti. Then the Pandaras with Kunti were taken by the ascetics to Hastinapura and introduced to Bhishma and Vidura, whereafter the ascetics disappeared from sight, while flames poured down upon the earth and the drums of the gods were heard. They then performed the obsequial rites for their father. As they were being brought up there Duryodhana became exceedingly jealous of them .- § 158: Brief mention of Duryodhana's efforts against the Pandayas: how they are sent by Dhriarashira to Varanavala to be burnt in a lac-house, but are rescued by Vidura; killing of Hidimba; they go to hkacakra; kill the Rakshasa Baka; go to Pañcalanagara, obtain Draupadi, and return home.- § 159: The eleven sons of the Pandavas: (1) Prativindhya (son of Yudhishthira); (2) Sutasoma (of Vykodara, i.e. Bhimasona); (8) Crutakirti (of Arjuna); (4) Catanika (of Nakula):

(5) Crutakarman (of Sahadeva); (6) Yaudheya (of Yudhiehthira Devika, daughter of Govarana Caibya); (7) Sarvaga (of Bhimasena~Balandhara Kaçya); (8) Abhimanyu (of (Arjuna~Subhadra, sister of Vasudeva, i.e. Krehna, from Dvaravatī); (9) Niramitra (of Nakula~Karenumatī Caidyā); (10) Suhotra (of Sahadova~ Vijayā Mādrī, daughter of the Madra king Dyutimat); (11) the Rakshana Ghatotkaca (of Bhimasona ~ Hidimba). Abhimanyu was the perpetuator of the family .- § 160: Abhimanyu married Utlara, daughter of Virata; she brought forth a dead child (of six months, burnt by the "weapon"), whom Kunti took up on her lap at the command of Vasudeva Purushottama, i.e. Krehna, who revived him and called him Parikshit, because he was born in an extinct race (parikahine kule). "Parikahit marcied Madrarati, thy mother Janamejaya! thou hast begotten two sons on thy wife Vapushtama, named Calanika and Cankukarna; and Catanika has on Vaidehi begot a son Acramedhadatta."-Blessings upon the readers (of all four castes) (I, 95).

The bathing there is equal to the bathing in all tirthas together and to horse-sacrifices, and frees even cadras from rebirth; especially the visiting of P. on the day of the fullmoon in the month of Karttika is equal in merit to the performing of agnihotras during a hundred years, and leads to the worlds of Brahman; dwelling twelve years purely at P. gives the merit of all sacrifices and leads to the abode of Brahman. Putradarcana ("the seeing of the sons"). §10 (Parvasangr.): 1, 2, 355 (i.e. Putradarcanaparvan).

[Putradarcanaparvan] (" the section relating to the seeing of the sons," the 96th of the minor parvans of Mhbhr.; of. Putradarçana). § 789: Janamejaya said: Tell me what that wonderful feat was which M.-r. Pyasa accomplished after his promise to Dhrtardshtra when he had taken up his abode in the forest with Gandhari and Kunti, and after Vidura had left his body and entered into Yudhishthira, and when all the Pandavas were in the ascetic retreat; for how many days did Yudhishthira stay with his men in the woods; on what food did the Pandaras support themselves with their men and wives? Vaicampayana said: The Pandavas passed about a month in that forest, supporting themselves on diverse kinds of food and drink. Then Vyāsa came there and Nārada, etc. (a); they sat down on sacred seats [of kuça grass] and on seats of peacock feathers; Gandhari, etc. (B) also sat down; they spoke of R., D., and As. Then Vydea said that he knew that burning grief in the heart of Dhrtarashtra, etc. (7); "let D., G., and M.-r. to-day behold the energy of my penances; therefore tell me what wish of thine I shall grant to-day." Dhrtardehtra wished to see his dead children and kinsmen. mentioning Duryodhana and the slaughter of Bhishma and Drona. Hearing this the grief of Gandhari, etc. (8) became fresh; Gandharl said that for sixteen years Dhrtarashtra never had elept for grief; and also Krshad, etc. (e) grieved exceedingly. Vydes then asked Kunti to tell what she wished (XV, 29). Kunti told the story of Karna's birth (mentioning Durvasas, etc.); Vyasa promised to show her

Karna, and said that she had no fault in what had happened about the birth of Karna; "the gods beget after five methods (thought, word, sight, touch, and sexual union)" (XV, 30). Vydea promised to show everyone the persons whom they wished to see and who were in the other world (5): "they were all portions of D.; both G., Aps., Pc., Gh., Ra., Punyajanah, Si., D.-r., D., and Da. met with death on the battlefield of Kurukshetra"; he explained who among the dead, etc., was what: Dhrtardshtra was the Gandharva king Dhrtardshtra. etc. (n). They all, Dhytardshira with his ministers and the Pandavas and R. and G., proceeded towards the Bhagirathi and waited for the advent of night; at sunset they bathed and finished their evening rites (XV, 31). When night came, Vyūsa plunged into the Bhagīrathī for a bath, and summoned all the deceased warriors, who all rose up from the water with a loud uproar, everyone presenting the same aspect that he did when clad for battle; there were Bhishma. etc.  $(\theta)$ ; all of them were now robed in celestial vestments and had brilliant earrings; they were free from all animosity, etc.; G. sang their praises, etc.; each of them was waited upon by bands of Aps. Vulsa gave Dhrtarashtra celestial vision; endued with celestial knowledge, Gandhari saw all the slain; Dhrtarashtra became full of joy (XV, 32). Divested of wrath and malice, the spirits of the dead mingled with the living in happy converse (1). Having sported with one another for that night they, taking leave from each other, returned to the places they had come from (x), Vydsa dismissing them within the twinkling of an eye; of Ra. and Pc. some proceeded to the Uttarakurus, others to the gods. With Vydsa's permission, many widows plunged into the waters of the Bhagīrathī in order to accompany their deceased lords, and proceeded to those regions where their husbands had found their abodes. Vyāsa granted to all the men there assembled the fruition of their wishes. People of diverse realms, hearing of this meeting between the dead and living, became highly delighted (XV, 33) .- § 790: Sauti said: Janamejaya filled with joy asked Vaiçampāyana, how it is possible for persons whose bodies have been destroyed to reappear in those very forms. Vaicampāyana said: Acts are never destroyed; bodies are born of acts; so also are features, etc., quoting a cruti in the horse-sacrifice (XV. 34). Dhrtardshtra had never beheld his own sons, but got spiritual vision from Vyasa, he had learnt all the royal duties, as also the Vedas and Upanishads; Vidura attained to high success through penances. Janamejaya said: If Vydsa shows me my father as he was when he died I may then believe all that thou hast told me. Sauti said: Then Vyasa brought Parikshit [from the other world], and Camika and his son Crigin; all the counsellors and ministers of the king beheld them. Janamejaya, performing the final bath in his sacrifice, highly rejoiced; he poured the sacred water over his father, as also over himself; then he said to Astika that this his sacrifice was fraught with many wonderful incidents; Astika praised Vydea and the snake-sacrifice, from which Takehaka had with difficulty escaped, the worship of R., etc. Janamejaya honoured Astika, and then asked R. Vaicampayana about Dhrtarashtra's further residence in the woods (XV, 35).-§ 791: Janamejaya said: Having seen his sons, etc., what did Dhrtarashtra, and king Yudhishthira also, do? Vaicampayana said: Beholding that wonderful sight, the reappearance of his children, R.-r. Dhytaraehtra became relieved of his grief and returned to his retreat; the people and R., dismissed by Dhytardshira, returned home. Vydes came and asked Dhrtarashtra to dismiss the Pandavas ("thou hast heard discourses from R., the mysteries of D. from Narada, etc."), who now had passed more than a month in the woods. Dhrtardshtra addressed Yudhishthira affectionately, and dismissed him and his brothers. Yudhishthira offered to wait upon his uncle and his two mothers; Gandhari dissuaded him from that step. Yudhishthira said that his mind was wholly set upon penances, as the whole earth were empty now, etc. (a) Sahadeva, saying that he dared not leave his mother. urged Yudhishthira to return to the capital; he would himself remain, engaged in penances and in serving the old king and his mothers. Kunti affectionately dissuaded her sons from remaining with her and thereby obstructing her penances. They then took leave of their mother and Dhrtarashtra, who blessed and comforted Yudhishthira, etc. (B), and embraced them one after another. Then Gandhari blessed them, and Kunti kissed them on their heads, etc. Gandhari and Kunti embraced Draupadi, etc., and instructed them. Yudhishthira with his wives and troops and kinsmen set out for Hastinapura (XV, 36).
